Applied to Diphtheria by Prof. Eduring.

The new treatment of diphtheria by means of antitoxine serum has occupled the attention of the medical world for about a year and a hult. It has been the leading subject for discussion at assoclaitions, all congresses, at the May meeting of time American Medical Association, and at the late meeting of the British Medical Association.

All agree that it possesses both curative and prophylactic actions, the degree of success whose being discussed. The suc-cess of this remely in this particular disease thas opened up new fields for re-search in the same line in the treatment of other gernficidal discusses. A review of the curucive action and the mode of preparation of the serum will be timely, especially so as it is claimed that thus treatment has already reduced the mor-tality of this dread disease to less than

The cardinal principal upon which its curative action depends is contained in the fact that the blood possesses in its normal conscituents a certain germicidal, or disease killing, action due to some constituent not yet clearly defined. This isms and their products predominate. For instance, in typhoid fever this battle rages for 2i days. If the blood is vic-torious in the struggle, this germicidat or disease-killing constituent is enor-mously increased, and consequently prodestroyed by the good and sincere men duces an immunity in that particular disease until it has disappeared from the cerns, Monblood, which in different diseases varies Patents or greatly-for instance, smallpox, after sucing subsisting between the controlling vaccination for seven years or more, or in diphtheria six or eight morehia. In consideration of this fact the question arose, How can we produce an artificial immunity in an ani make a practical application thereof? The action of antitoxine, then, is physio-logical and natural, in that it is simply transmitting its accumulated geometical constituents from the animal in the disease is cured by the serum con-baining this constituent acting upon and destroying the thisease organisms in the system into which it has been introduced. The germicide or antitoxine scrum is produced in this way: A hea'thy ani-mal, known to be susceptible to the disease, is selected, either a goat, a sheep or a horse. He is treated with a subcutameous injection of a culture media containing diphtheria bacilli. This injecion, which is called the primary, is in an attenuated form, as the germs are subjected to 85 degrees Cent. of heat for five minutes, thus rendering them less virulent. In three days he is again may be, espire to any office, no matter how hamble it is.
