They arouse the public mind to an interest in achietic affairs as nothing else does. The very intensity of them is wholesome and stimulating and on the principle that "it more stirs the blood to rouse the lion than to hunt the hare," there is more gained for athletics in one international contest than in a dozen local matches in which people feel only a languid interest. It is guite possible, moreover, that the irrhations themselves are beneficial. If they do not conduce toward friendly feelings to England, they at any rate intensify American patriotism. Take them all in all, our contests with the British on tand and sea have been good for us. It would be foolieh to drop them simply because Dunraven is un ass. Fortunately there is no fear that they will be dropped. We shall have athletes from Great Brityears to come; and we, without regard to Dunraven's petulance, will continue to welcome them and give them a fair field.

The first reason for this great deficit in the national revenue is that the present encorable tariff is based on the ad values principle. Its duties, therefore, bring a higher revenue when the prices are high, and a lower when the prices are low.
