THE ADDRESS OF THE EVENING. In his uddress, Judge A. A. Cleveland, the well known and popular orator, who oarmed in the East the title of the orator of the West, said in pare:

"Quinlin Lodge today mourns the loss of two of its brethers: Brother J. E. Plunkett, who died December 2, 1892, and Brother Simon Quinlin, of Chicago, the organizer of this lodge, who died August 26th, 1895, and for whom this lodge was named. And there is one more, an un-known brother, whom I met in my travels in an Eastern lodge, under peculiar cir-cumstances, and who is now with the unnumbered, whose memory I also want to perpetuate, with that of our departed brethren. This was a German brother, whose tender act of mercy to the little daughter of a disabled member was soon ollowed by his own death. "In locking back at the lives of those who have ogne before, in forecasting the future of ourselves, of in dwelling upon the present, of times a flower in the sun-light, the song of a bird, the chirp of an autumn insect, will carry us back as in a dream to other days when field out tempting morsels to our longing eyes. All nature was in a smiling mood that day, the sun was shining on the cottage roof; and high in air the skylark sang his matin lay of gratitude and raise, that while the sweet stra no reached the earth, the prayer from sorrow's breaking heart, and from misery's pallid lips might be wafted in a melody of song to "Him who doeth all things well." The tooklet swiftly runs along to where the hand of God had placed its pebbly bed, which like an organ's pearly note, when touched with skill, givas forth a glorious melody. The sparkling waters here divide, and with bejeweled fingers press each pebbly key and at the touch each gives forth a plaintive, tender note; the wind springs to the listening trees, and bending low the bough, gently shakes the leafy castenets which, mingling with the brooklet's liquid notes, produce a symbrooklet's liquid notes, produce a symphony so sweet and rich and full than the soul of man is filled with gratitude to God and love of fellow-man. The sephyrs kiss the roses on the cottage sorch, and steal and hear away their perfumed breath to where the daisies nod their silver heads among the waving, rustling grass. The wild bee hums and lits from flower to flower; the cattle low upon the distant hills and now upon the breeze is bourne the seent of new mown

Justice woveless green and why stem to raise it from the sod, that truth in every age and clime should always stand erect, and when the sun had gone to rest behind the western hills, and no human eye was there to see, sweet Charity placed a golden drop upon the blue, cemented with a toar. The hand of Brotherly Love then sought out the little floral gem, nurtured it with loving care, and placed it on a idelity from the agure sky, the embler it with loving care, and placed it on brother's grave; the runtle of an angel wing was heard and as it touched the lower a sweet voice murmured, in ac-snis low, the words. "Forget me not." The name was whitpered at the gates ilar, and at the sound the gates wide pen flew, and now an angel rests beside ach flower, and whether it is worn upor he breast, in remembrance of the parting cest, or in tender memory of the dead an angel nester close beside and prays, and cach soul, as it leaves the earth, sends a loving message by the flower and amid the music of the spheres is heard a soft refrain, 'Forget-me-not.'"
