NO MIDDLE GROUND.

There can be no middle ground between honest and dishonest money. A dollar is either a dollar or it is not a dollar, and the government that means to make an honest dollar has no hesitation in saying so, not only in its obligations but

There can be no middle ground between a dollar intrinsically worth one hundred cents and a dollar that is intrinsically worth fifty-three cents. The government may interpose its omnipotent power, and maintain a fifty-three cent dollar by practically redeeming it in gold, but the government that thus degrades its currency necessarily impairs its credit with the nations of the world, and paralyzes business enterprise amongst its own peo-

The greenback is worth its face in overy section of the world because it is redeemable in gold, and the so-called silver dollar issued by our mints is accepted in other countries at nearly double its value, solely because the government credit is pledged to its redespution in full. The American visiting Mexico can buy fifty cents worth of goods, pay an American dollar to the seller and receive a Mexican dollar in exchange that is intrinsically worth more than the American coin. It is simply the credit of the government that makes the degraded silver dollar in this country pass current for a value nearly double its intrinsic worth

There are whispers of negotiations in both the great parties to harmonize on the money question by yielding much to the advocates of cheap money. Both parties are afraid of the coming presidenital election, and the leaders of each are Whatever he may may, he means silver monometallism, for the policy of free silver coinage once adopted in this country ?

There can be no middle ground on the question of money. It must be honest or dishonest, and the great parties of the country must in the next contest declare either for honest money, or substantially native of that town. declare against it.

This question must be met in the coming election, and it can be met in but one way. Parties must be for honest money or against it, and there are hundreds of recusands of intelligent fair minist men in tials parties who will regard the money is to an paramount to all, and vote for the next provident safely with reference to the embering establishment of honest meany in this country, in nacmony with the morey of the entire civilized world

When Mr. Blaine was for the last time in New York on his way to Washington, stopping, as was his habit, at the Fifth avenue hotel, he asked me to walk with him to his room, fronting on Twenty-third street, on the parior floor, and he slowly, as if it were a task, unlocked the door. There was a spark of autumnal crispmess in the air, and he had a fire that in all its transactions and all its utter- There was not much to say. It was plain at last that Mr. Blaine was fading, that he had within a few weeks falled very fest. His great, bright eyes were greater than ever, but not so bright. His face was awfully white; not that brainy pallor that was familiar-something else; He scated himself in the light of the age on an easy chair. There was a knock at his door, and a servant hunded him a card, and he said: "No," and we were alone. I could not think of a word of consolation; and in a moment he appeared to have forgotten me, and stared in a fixed rapt dream at the flickering flame is the grate. It occurred to no to get up and go away quietly, as conversation was impossible—for there was too much to say. It came to me that I After so ought not to leave him alone. Something in him reminded me of the mystical phrases of the transcendant paragraph of his cration on Garfield, picturing the death of the second marryred president, by the ocean, while far off white ships touched the sea and sky, and the fevered face of the dying man felt "the breath of the eternal morning." Some weeks earlier Mr. Blaine and I had had a deep talk about men und things, and he was very kind, and his boundless generosity of nature never revealed lustif with a greater or sadder charm. He now remembered that conversation-as a word disclosed-and sold; "I could have endured all things if my trying to harmonize their forces.
