being taught in some of the grades of the city schools. It is thought by some who are competent to judge that this is a move in the right direction. It is stated that heretofore and even at the present there is little uniformity of system in the method of teaching writing in the different schools, or even in the different rooms of the same school. Scholars attain, under sych a system, slovenly habits of permanship which are most deplorable. Complaint is made that the spellers used in some of the grades of the city schools are entirely too difficult for the pupils using them; and that, with it all, the books contain some inaccurácies. On the whole, Astoria's schools compare favorably with any in the state, being taught in some of the grades of the
