YALE AT HENLEY.

Whether Yale be victorious or not at Henley, it is clear that she has made the race for the grand challenge cup the most interesting ever known. The despatches show how all England is putting forth its strength to beat Yale. It is, in fact, Yale-a single American university-against all England. This cannot be said in a spirit of complaint. Yale knew the conditions of the contest when she entered for the cup. But if she triumphs her triumph will be the more glorious and if she fails death will be no dishonor.

The trial reports are not particularly favorable for Yale. Leander and New College have both been over the course in shorter time than our American boys. No great importance is attached to that. It is evident that Mr. Cook is feeling his way. He does not shrink from experiments, near as the race is. He has raised the slides and apparently been coaching one or two men by slides. He has ordered new cars of a different pattern from those to which his methods of training. Undoubtedly ing La Grippe. Terrible paroxysms of coughing would last hours with little he has altered the stroke in spite of his early declaration about fighting it out on the old line.

With an ordinary coach his men might well grow nervous under all these novelties, but their confidence in Mr. Cook is unbounded and deserved. It is plain he has made up his mind that under the old conditions the chance of winning was none too good. Risks had to be taken, and he has taken them, as every good commander must, even on the eve of battle.
