Captain Crowert's craft has a bowsprit four feet five inches in length, and its mainmast is eight feet high. Sixty pounds of lead is necessary to weigh down the keel.

Much speculation has been caused Sound shipping as to the meaning of the word "Maru," which forms a part of the name of all Japanese vessels visiting the Sound. S. Someya, chancellor to the consulate of Japan, ex plained yesterday that "Maru" is term applied to all merchant craft, great or small, steamer or sailor. The name of the Japanese steamer now on the Sound is the Kinshui Maru. All bear the common cognomen. "Kan." For example, Yoshima Kan is the name of the Japanese warship recently dispatched to Manila by the Japanese government to represent Japan at the eat of war. The name Nippon Yusen Kaisha, familiar to persons of the Pacific coast, means the "Japanese Mail Steamship Company." Nippon is the true name of Japan; Yusen means inali steamship, and "Kalaha means empany.-Ledger.

One of the floats which Captain Petrie, of the British steamer Linlithgow. set afloat before he abandoned his vessel in mid-Pacific several months ago, was picked up many weeks later by the barkentine Tam o'Shanter. Captain W. Patterson, the barkentine's master, arrived in port with his craft a few days ago, and it was not until he had heard the story of the Linlithgow that he could account for his find.

"It was on November 1st," says the captain in his report to the Hydro sraphic office, "and we were becalmed in latitude 13 degrees 6 minutes west.

We saw something floating, with a mast in it, and lowered a boat and brought it alongside. It proved to be weeks, pursuant to an order of the the hatch of a ship. The stick or mast had had a piece of tin attached, but it had been broken off with in an inch of the mast. It also had some rope yarus clinging to it, as if something had been made fast to it; whatever it was had been carried away.
