But the bravest soldier has old ret. always a certain cheerfulness, and fights the better because he has. One needs a little of the wine of life to strengthen his heart in the struggle. He is God's soldier too, and the issue is certain, if he keep up good heart and hope, and fight away faithfully. The spring of tears and laughter lie close together, and a healthy nature originates the one as promptly as the other. Take it altogether, there is a good deal to be thankful for in this life, and there is a fair amount of right good enjoyment to be got out of it if one keeps his eyes open and looks after it.

It is the peculiarity of a good-natured man that does this. He can be grim as anybody when necessary, but he does not think it necessary to be grim all the time. He does not make bedfellows of his troubles, nor carry his sorrows and disappointments in bundles under his arm round the streets.

It is his misfortune to be taken, on this account, for a light person sometimes, for an uncarnest man, a man who laughs and jests, and is "undignified."
