Kate Asks for a Raise

By JANE OSBORN

Kate had worked for Timothy Fanshaw for nearly a year and dissatisfaction was creeping upon her. As private secretary to Timothy Fanshaw she knew that others in his employ always had an increase in wage or salary before they had worked for him a year. It had never been the policy of the advertising concern of Fanshaw & Sons to pay large salaries to start. Employees were made to feel that it was a privilege to work for a concern like Fanshaw's; moreover, there was the bait of higher wages.

"As soon as you are worth more to us your salary will be increased," was what the Fanshaws, father and sons, usually said when employing new help. But they seldom increased wages to employees who did not insist on it. The dissatisfaction of Kate Weston was so great that, after a particularly busy day in the office one December day, Kate Weston did not sleep at night—in fact, she did not try. She was trying to compose a suitable speech with which to broach the subject of a raise in salary.

She imagined every possible contingency, and so vivid was her imagination as she lay in her small boarding house bed that she could almost see Timothy Fanshaw's look of perplexity. She almost heard him say, "Miss Weston, I am sorry. But it is bad policy to pay a person more than he or she is worth. Your work is satisfactory, still there are others who would accept your salary who could do the work as well—"

Kate Weston's face flushed with indignation there on her pillow and her fists clenched under the blankets. "Mr. Fanshaw," she whispered, "if there are other women who can do my work as well you had better get one. If you could afford to pay me $30 a year ago you can afford to pay me more now that I am doing twice as much work as I did then."

Then she saw Mr. Fanshaw's good-looking face smile mildly. Women in an office always seemed to amuse Mr. Fanshaw a little. If she were a man and were doing the work she was doing now he would pay her twice thirty dollars, she was sure. But Mr. Fanshaw, like other men, Kate concluded, never liked to let a woman earn much money. Yet it was men like that who threw money away on the women at home—wives and daughters and sisters and mothers who didn't do half so much to deserve it. Why were men always so much more willing to throw money away on a woman than to pay her for what she honestly earned? Kate worked herself up into quite a fever of excitement and heard the clock strike three before she closed her eyes.

Meantime Timothy Fanshaw, napping on the lounge of his sitting room at the club rather than going comfortably to bed, little dreamed he was figuring as an oppressor of poor working girls in any one of his imaginings, least of all in those of Kate Weston, his secretary. He had something on his mind—a problem he wanted to thresh out with himself, and he did not want to turn in for sleep in bed until he had settled it. Toward dawn Fanshaw solved his problem, but he was too sleepy then to take the trouble to go to bed for the brief remainder of the time that he could sleep.

So Timothy Fanshaw was no more refreshed than his secretary on the December morning that followed. Still a certain sort of excitement served as a stimulant to make him forget how weary he really was.

Diction, however, flowed along in much the same way as usual. Timothy had a way of attending to certain of his letters almost mechanically and Kate knew so well what he was going to say that the dashes and dots, pot-hooks and loops flowed out from the end of her well-sharpened pencil almost before he had uttered the words they indicated.

Then came luncheon time. Kate had decided to approach her employer after he had eaten. She had an idea that he would be more tractable then than when he was hungry.

"I have been rather worried lately," she began. "In fact, I could hardly sleep last night." She had planned this beginning. But Mr. Fanshaw's reaction was not at all according to expectation. She had thought he would merely smile amusedly and continue signing letters or checks.

"What a coincidence," is what he really said, and he let the pen fall from his hand and pushed the letters back from the blotter on his large flat-topped desk. "You see, I didn't sleep either. I was very much worried. I have come to a fork in the road. I must choose which way to turn."

"So have I," said Kate. Which wasn't what she had planned to say next, but she managed to get back into her role in spite of the false cue. "I have been here almost a year, Mr. Fanshaw."

"It seems much longer," sighed Timothy Fanshaw. "We have met here day after day, rain or shine, every day but two weeks in the summer—"

"Yes," interrupted Kate, "and I have grown to know your work so well that I know what you are going to say before you say it." Kate was going to suggest that she could really attend to most of his correspondence and therefore might become more valuable to him. But Timothy Fanshaw interrupted.

"And I have become so well acquainted with you that I know just which way you are going to look under any given circumstances. Funny, isn't it?" "So, as I was going to say," continued Kate, determined not to be sidetracked, "I have been thinking that unless this is worth something to you I'd better try to locate somewhere where there will be a chance for advancement. I have ambitions as much as any one—"

"You ambitious?" exclaimed Mr. Fanshaw. "Why, I never thought of that. I didn't realize that you were that sort of a girl. I thought—"

"I hope you didn't think that I was willing to see every one advance himself while I—"

"While you, what?" said Timothy Fanshaw, looking now really amused. Kate's little hands became tense and her cheeks showed the color of indignation.

"While I stay here in this office getting just $30 a week for the rest of my life."

"I'm blessed!" said Timothy Fanshaw.

Now Kate's indignation was increasing. "Don't say 'I'm blessed' to me," she said, with fire in her usually soft brown eyes. "You seem to think or try to make me think you think that just because I'm a woman I've no ambition. I didn't mean to become angry, Mr. Fanshaw. I meant only to ask for a raise."

Mr. Fanshaw here began to laugh.

"If I should offer you $35 or $40 or $50 you'd remain?" he asked.

"I suppose I would," said Kate, a little shamefaced. "For $50 I know I would."

"And why should I? I can get a dozen girls who can do your work as well as you do it for $30 a week."

"That's just exactly what I thought you were going to say," said Kate.

Timothy Fanshaw ignored the interruption. "But I can never find another young woman who will so perfectly coincide with my idea of a perfect wife. You see, Miss Weston, I'm humbly begging you to marry me, while you apparently would rather continue as my secretary with an increased salary."

Kate Weston was still blushing furiously and becomingly, but it was from embarrassment, not from indignation.

"You mean that—that you love—"

"Certainly I love you."

"I suppose it would be fibbing to say I didn't love you, too," admitted Kate. "But I never thought—"

But Kate never finished the sentence.

EGYPT HAS MANY COURTS

Mixed Population of Country Requires Brand of Justice for Each.

The doubt as to the nationality of a person suspected of murder in Alexandria reveals the difficulties attendant on the number of jurisdictions that obtain in Egypt. The Egyptian investigating authorities are not recognized as competent to proceed in the case if the accused is a German, while the German authorities will not take action in the matter till it is decided that he belongs to their nationals.

Egypt possesses at least three concurrent jurisdictions. The native courts deal with all crimes committed by natives and all civil disputes between Egyptian subjects. The mixed courts, staffed with judges representative of all the European powers holding capitulations in Egypt, decide civil cases between Europeans of different nationalities or between Europeans and natives. And the consular courts of the various powers decide all cases between their own nationals and charges of crime brought against such nationals. Finally the "Sharia," or native religious Moslem courts, decide all cases of inheritance and of what we should call "chancery" matters for Mohammedans, while the different patriarchal councils act in similar cases for Jews, Greeks, Armenians and others. —Manchester Guardian.

Sensitive Ears.

An amusing incident, says a contributor, occurred at the Republican national convention in Chicago in 1904. The late George A. Knight of California, who had one of the loudest voices of any public speaker of his time, was one of the speakers. Among those who preceded him on the program were some of the foremost orators of the party, whereas Knight was comparatively unknown. They struggled valiantly to make themselves heard by the vast audience that filled every nook and cranny of the Coliseum, but were frequently interrupted by cries of "Louder! Louder!"

Then came Knight's turn, and he advanced to the front of the platform. "Ladies and gentlemen," he began, and the resonant tones rolled over the astonished audience like a tidal wave. Before he could say another word a voice from a remote corner of the hall called out with startling distinctness, "Not so loud!" The laughter that followed made it impossible for the speaker to continue for several minutes.

"Van."

The Dutch have the reputation of being very economical and very careful in watching the details of domestic affairs, no matter how small.

"Heiny!" called the father.

"Vat?" answered the son.

"Run and count dem geese again, Heiny."

"All right."

Heiny went; Heiny returned.

"Heiny!" said the father.

"Vat?" said the son.

"Did you count dem geese again, Heiny?"

"Yes."

"How many vas dey, Heiny?"

"Van."

A MAN WHO BECAME FAMOUS

Doctor R. V. Pierce, whose picture appears above, was not only a successful physician but also a profound student of the medicinal qualities of Nature's remedies, roots and herbs, and by close observation of the methods used by the Indians, he discovered their great remedial qualities, especially for weaknesses of women, and after careful preparation succeeded in giving to the world a remedy which has been used by women with the best results for half a century. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is still in great demand, and many other so-called "cure-alls" have come and gone. The reason for phenomenal success is because of its purity, and Dr. Pierce's high standing as an honored citizen of Buffalo is a guarantee of all that is claimed for the Favorite Prescription as a regulator for the ill peculiar to women.
