FEEDLOT LAMENESS REQUIRES ATTENTION
All farm animals are subject to foot-rot, possibly sheep more than the others. It is usually associated with dirt and barnyard filth. Mud sometimes dries between the claws to the consistency of a brick, which causes an abrasion, and this paves the way for necrophorus infection. Most outbreaks are infectious. After the lameness has become severe there is a slight discharge, with very offensive odor, and the hoof becomes rotten, usually in one spot which soon spreads to the deeper structures. After a fortnight the claws begin to separate, the animal is voraciously and in great pain; the claws may slough, and the animal be unable to stand if more than one foot is affected.
