PARADOXICAL as it may seem at first blush, the declaration made so frequently by psychologists and economists that but few people can bear prosperity, is nevertheless true.

"When I come into the fortune which is to be mine on the day of my majority," says the youth who is looking forward to what he considers is to be the crowning event of his life, "I shall show my set how a gentleman of wealth and fine tastes should live and enjoy himself."

So when the riches come in showers and floods, the prodigal youngster starts off at a rapid pace on a carefree career which in an incredibly short time ends in broken manhood and humiliating disaster.

It is the story which is so often told of the sowing of wild oats and the reaping of tares and dishonor-of the selling of a soul for a rag and a bone. The handling of large properties and

Have You This Habit?

By Margaret Morison hannannesser soncensensensensensensen

JOHN STARK

"THE habit of regret is four-fifths gence," was John Stark's slogan, John knew something about the habit of regret. Up to the time he was twentytwo years old, he had lived at home in his father's house. His father's regret was the good old times. John was brought up to feel that the best things the world would know had passed before he was born. With them lived a malden aunt who kept house. She was a kind of personification of regret, but what she had lost John never knew until he was a big boy of sixteen or so. Then he learned that she had been disappointed in love. Finally it turned out that Mr. Smith, who lived in the next town and had ten children, was the living symbol of this

Then the boy's father dled, and he started in upon his career as an underclerk in the big real estate company where, had his father lived, he would have begun as a junior partner. Some one remarked one day that It was a shame he should have to regret all this when he was so young and John replied that he had no time to regret It.

Eventually he worked up very near to the top and then he was taken into the firm. A month later the firm falled. Other big companies had no interest in John Stark, and he could find no opening with any one of them. Then John Stark decided to make his own opening. It was about this time that some one suggested that life had dealt him a very hard hand; his answer was that he couldn't be bothered about that Take that next job to your because he had a job to put through In his real estate experience he had noticed the need for a firm to handle small and inexpensive, but up-to-date. dwellings, and such a company he now started out to organize.

Little by little he not only increased his own income, but also was granted the realization that he had made a crowded city more liveable for hundreds of families. On the day when he was fifty years of age, a group of very old acquaintances had dinner with him. Naturally they talked of the past. One was sure that if he had had the money to go to college he would have achieved his ambition to become a doctor. If another had been one inch taller he would have gone to West Point and risen in the army; barred that career, the world held nothing for him. So one after another round the circle presented his excuses and his regrets. But all the time John Stark knew that, if the would-be doc tor had been endowed, or if the would be general had been a giant, the one would never have been awarded the Nobel prize nor the other the Congressional medal. For the man who has the habit of regret is not the stuff of which heroes are made
