IN THE DEAD OF NIGHT

By EDGAR W. COOLEY

( by Short Story Pub. Co.)

of blowing a "burglar-proof" safe and is then satisfied to go on his way with a woman's picture in-stead of the bank funds.

8 HE stepped out of the alley into the street, it began to rain dismaily. This pleased him, for it added to the blackness of the night and had a tendency to drive away any late pedestrian. He was not hampered by luggage. Such tools as he needed-a bar of soap, an airpump, a can of nitroglycerin, some fuse, a jimmy, a dark lantern, a revolver-he carried in his pockets, and, under his coat, a folded grain -sack,

Without pausing, without hesitating. he gianced searchingly up and down the street. A smoking oil lamp stood upon a post on the corner of the main street of the village, its feeble rays struggling ineffectively in the No living creature was stirring; no other glimmer visible.

A few strides took him to the side window of a building. The sill was on a level with his head. He tried to raise the sash, but, as he had expected, it was fastened. So he took the jimmy from his pocket, and, slipping its thin edge under the frame. threw all his weight suddenly upon the handle.

With a report like that of a pistol, the lock snapped. For five minutes, perhaps, the burglar crouched in the shadows under the window, watching, listening. But not a sound, save the patter of the rain in the gutter, did he hear; not a moving object did he Then carefully, noiselessly, he pushed up the sash and climbed in. He was in total darkness, but knew exactly where he stood. He could have drawn an accurate, detailed plan of the interior of the building-knew precisely how many feet it was from the window to the safe; from the safe to the front doors; from the window to his car, standing in the alley at the rear.

So, although he could not see his hand before him, he turned confidently to his left and walked six paces. Then be circled to his right around the end of the counter, and took four steps more. Pausing, he reached out his hand and touched the safe.

The burglar moved his hand glee fully over the door and laughed. The bank was not provided with a vault. A good vault costs as much as a building, and this was a small bank in a country town. So the funds were entrusted to the protection of this "burglar-proof" safe. He wondered what the citizens would say about "burglar-proof" safes while gathering up the pieces!

Without losing a moment, he filled the cracks around the door of the safe with soap, leaving one small opening. To this opening he attached his pump and exhausted the air on the inside.

Closing the opening, he cut a piece off the bar of soap, and, rolling it between his palms and molding it with his fingers, soon fashioned it into the shape of a small cup. This he fastened at the bottom of the door and filled with nitroglycerin. Then he attached a fuse.

Ten feet from the safe, a opened into the rear office of the bank, and in this room the safe-breaker had planned to seek refuge while the explosive was doing its work. Not desiring to tarry unnecessarily in close proximity to a charge of nitroglycerin safe, he fled, and two things only did about to explode, he concluded, before lighting the fuse, to satisfy himself that the door of this inner room was not locked or bolted.

He turned the knob, the door opened readily, and he took one step across the threshold. Then he paused. In the intense darkness he could not see an object; in the perfect silence he could not hear a sound.

But -something-premonition, instinct, some indefinable sixth sensesomething sent a chill through him. and he trembled as one who suddenly becomes conscious of the presence of unseen spirits. Without the power to move, he stood, staring into the darkness, the perspiration standing in icy drops upon his forehead.

With the desperation that fear inspires, he drew his dark-lantern, slipped back the slide, and threw the searching glare around the room, lighting first the most distant corner. Slowly he moved the lantern, bringing the round spot of brilliant light toward him across the carpet. Suddenly he uttered a low cry and shrank back as the light fell fiercely upon an object almost at his feet. So near that by stooping the burglar could have touched him, a dead man lay, his waxen face and sightless eyes turned upwards! The carpet where his head and shoulders rested, gleamed scarlet with his blood; the nerveless fingers of his right hand clasped a pistol; in the center of his forehead was a ghastly wound. With a strange weakness in his knees the burglar bent over the dead man, brushed back his matted hair, took the pistol gently from his fingers and folded his hands across his breast. In the corpse the cracksman recognized Frazer, the bank cashler. On the desk beside him was the following letter, unsealed: "Being no longer able to conceal my shortage, to hide the fact that the safe does not contain the amount of money that it should, and being a coward, I have chosen a coward's method of paying my debt. I do not ask for pity. I only ask compassion for my wife."

For a moment the burglar stood undecided, the letter in his hand. Suddenly, breaking the impressive silence, came the loud ringing of a telephone bell. Instantly, involuntarily, the burglar closed the lantern slide, gripped his pistol and crouched behind the desk. Again the bell rang, and mechanically he arose and walked to the telephone. Standing with one foot on each side of the dead cashler, he took down the receiver.

"Hello," he said, imitating the voice of one whose eyes he could feel, but could not see. He was answered by a woman

"Oh, Henry!" she cried, "I have just awakened from such a vivid, such an awful dream. I know it is silly, but it frightened me. I dreamed that you were in trouble, in disgrace. And then I awoke and found you had not returned home. Oh, Henry, what is keeping you so late? Come home at once, will you not, dear?"

"Yes," the burglar replied, as one in a daze.

"Do," she continued, and there was anxiety in her voice. "I am so glad, so glad it was only a dream. I would rather see you dead than dishonored, Henry dear."

The cracksman ercpt back to the desk and seated himself in the dead man's chair, the woman's voice still ringing in his ears.

That voice! It haunted him like a memory of long ago, like an echo of the days of childhood. It stirred, it thrilled him. It aroused that old mad love of his boyhood. Whose voice was it? Undoubtedly the wife of that dead coward lying at his feet. But who had she been before before she married him?

That voice! Could it be Martha's? Years and years ago, when they were schoolmates, he had loved Martha, worshiping her from afar, for she was a dweller on the avenue, and he a child of the tenements. A vast social gulf divided them, but he loved her in secret, knowing that he scarcely entered her thoughts.

Once he had thrashed a boy for teasing her, and she had smiled at him. He had never forgotten that The reason for the federal governsmile. That was years and years ago. but, though she had long since passed out of his life, he had never loved another. And now-was that voice indeed the voice of Martha?

Again the burglar deliberately opened the side of his lantern and turned the gleam upon the desk. Directly in front of him he saw a picture in the silver frame. It was a photograph of a woman-not a particularly handsome woman-but glorified by a dazzling smile-and he recognized that smile!

From that face he turned reluctantly at last to gaze with scorn at the cold features of the man lying there with the scarlet mark of sin upon his brow. He felt no pity nownothing but contempt-but Martha's words, "I would rather see you dead than dishonored," rang in his ears.

With a smile he placed the letterthe contemptible letter-in his pocket, picked up Frazer's pistol, replaced the empty shell with a loaded cartridge, ald the went Then he tore the collar of the cashler's in a couple of hours. The new artery coat, ripped one sleeve half its length, including 15 miles of graveled road and and overturned the chairs and scat- 21 miles of asphalt, is a decided-imtered them about.

It was nearly daybreak. In a few moments the gray would be creeping up the eastern sky.

Quickly the burglar blew the safe and scattered the gold and silver and banknotes upon the floor. "Now," he said, to himself, "they will find the bank broken, the safe looted, the cashler murdered!" Leaving his soap and dark lantern by the shattered he take-the cashier's letter and the photograph in the silver frame.

Through the rain and darkness be drove away, penniless but not unhappy. A woman's smiling face seemed to thank him. He laughed aloud as he fled through the gray of morning, thinking of a schoolgirl smiling at a ragged urchin.

FRIENDS ARE MADE BY USE OF ROADS

There are now in the United States 455,000 miles of surfaced highways. Every ten years the total, including country roads, will be around 800,000 miles, which will constitute a marvelous basic system excelling that of any nation in the world.

We are making rapid progress not only in road building, but also in our understanding of highway financing. taxation and use. It is worth while to realize the fundamental significance of all this activity which in the final analysis is simply an investment in neighborliness.

On the political and social side, neighborliness means mutual understanding and the ability to live together in harmony. It means that the West knows the South and appreciates its problems, and vice versa, writes Roy D. Chapin, chairman of the highway committee of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce.

On the commercial side, neighboritness means ready facilities for distribution, ease of travel. In short, that the distant point can be reached as well as the nearby point.

We are in a highly fortunate position in that this country has a gridtron of rail lines. This gridiron should be maintained, operated, encouraged on a sound basis. Given this long-haul transportation equipment. the highway system becomes doubly serviceable because it means that every community of 5,000 population is linked not only with a motor-travel system, but is likewise within rapid transit reach of the long-distance rallroad service.

It is recognized that the motor-car ser gets a more immediate and more definite return from improved highways than any other class of the community.

The burden of federal expenditure for highways has not, however, fallen on the general taxpayer at all as yet. ment entering into highway construction, moreover, is given in President Coolidge's message to congress of December 6, 1923, in which he said:

"No expenditure of public money contributes so much to the national vealth as for building good roads." In view of the enormous extent of this country, totaling 3,000,000 square miles, there is no other public work which is more deserving of our attention.

New California Road Is

Now Open to All Traffic

Easterners motoring to California by the southern route can now save considerable time through use of the newly improved highway between Yuma and the Imperial valley, which is now open.

The trip of 65 miles over the sand dunes between Yuma and El Centro, now can be made reasonably provement over the old desert road that stretched across the sand hills.

This work has been consistently urged by the Automobile Club of Southern California, which leading motor organization is highly gratified at being able to tell tourists that this southern route'to the state line at last has been placed on a par with the trunk lines of the state.

It is felt that this improvement is one that will uphold the statemen that the saving in cost of operation to motor vehicle users who travel over an improved highway is more than enough to maintain the highway. This conclusion was announced by the Na tional Automobile Chamber of Commerce following investigations made in North Carolina and other states in connection with the argument that the motor vehicle should pay for all highway maintenance.

Tax in Many States

Thirty-seven of the forty-eight states and the District of Columbia start 1925 with a gasoline tax in force. In several states the tax is 1 cent, in 18 states and the District of Columbia it is 2 cents, in two it is 21/2 cents, in nine it is 3 cents and in one state it is 4 cents. Of the remaining 11 states. Wisconsin, Minnesota, Illinois, Iowa and New Jersey, as well as Kansas, all have gusoline tax measures under con sideration. It is probable that most of these measures will be enacted into laws. Massachusetts is the only state that has definitely turned down a go tax measure by popular vote and it is generally believed that the reason for this defeat is to be found in the upportionment of funds proposed rather than in the fact that it was a gasoline tax.

To Relieve Traffic Jam

The first step toward dual highwayto lessen traffic congestion, partially due to heavy movement of trucks, may be taken by Massachusetts, for the state department of public works is planning a $2,000,000 highway paral leling the state highway from Boston to Worcester. The new highway is to follow closely the present Worces ter turnpike. A legislative appropria tion will be necessary before work on this much needed improvement can be inaugurated.
