ELECTIONS COME

HIGH IN GERMANY (By the United Press) BERLIN.—(By Mail.)—Democracy comes fairly high in Germany. While she has no campaign expense laws like America, she is already learning that elections are costly as evidenced by a compilation of the costs for the national assembly and Prussian land assembly elections some months back. The expense against the government was more than 1,000,000 marks, while to the parties involved the expense was more than 6,000,000 marks.

These expenses are likely to be vastly increased when the elections for the Reichstag occur. So far, no definite dates have been set for these, but the present regime is striving hard to get the elections postponed to next spring on the theory that elections this fall or winter would only make for fresh unrest. Both the right and the left are massing funds, however, so as to make a strong campaign against the moderate regime, and the new tests will furnish one of the bitterest campaigns ever waged in Europe.
