NOVELTIES IN UNDERMUSLINS INVITE ATTENTION TO COLOR

NOW that the season for spring sewing is on, when women occupy themselves with replenishing their own and their children's undermuslins, we find that many novelty garments invite the attention of the seamstress.

The annual "white sales" which supply the material for this seasonal sewing, have blossomed out with new color, new cloths and new modes of trimming—when there is trimming. It remains to be seen whether the introduction of color and ingenious new decorations will last or not, but manufacturers have faith in it and have made nainsook, batiste and other cottons in almost as many colors as we find in silk underwear.

It is not worth while to put much work on the short-lived, soon outgrown garments for children. Manufacturers are showing such sensible garments as the pajama pictured here. This is made of cotton crepe, cut in one piece, with komono sleeves, and has long pantalettes ending in a flounce at the ankles. The required fullness is gathered in at the front and back and the pantalettes attached to the body across the back by means of buttons and buttonholes. Muslins, printed cottons, and saten are also used for these garments. Jacquard crepe, in white or colored designs, and saten are used for pajamas in new types, for grown-ups also and they are easier to make than the regulation model.
