Famine Relief Worker Tells of Gastly Sights

(By International News Service) NEW YORK, Feb. 23.—A gnarly picture of famine conditions in Russia, where the American Relief administration is feeding 1,000,000 children and giving hope to all of Russia, was given here by Carl E. Floete, one of the administration's workers who returned recently after three months spent in the Volga district. Floete broke down under the strain of the work and being cut off from the outside world for weeks and had to leave temporarily.

"I hope to go back," he said. "The organization is saving that part of Russia and could do much more if it had more funds. No one who has not seen it can have any idea what famine is like. It is terrible beyond words. People are dying in the streets every day, their bodies bloated and distorted by starvation. Those who exist from day to day do so only by eating the carcasses of horses and dogs and cats that also have starved."

"I went with a child-feeding station that has headquarters at Samara, and feeds 50,000 children. My own headquarters in this district were at Pugachov, a village about 125 miles south of Samara, but which, owing to poor transportation, it took five days to reach by railroad. Most of the supplies went in over this road, although some were conveyed by half-dead horses.

"Most Awful Thing Is Their Apathy" "The most awful thing about the people is their apathy. They don't care, and just wait from day to day until they shall drop besides other members of their family who went first. The dead lie in the streets where they fall. In the houses the men, women and children sit helplessly against the walls staring into vacancy and waiting for death. I was the only American man they had ever seen, but they were hardly interested in me, even when they knew I brought food.

"They used to take it in their hands, with tears in their eyes, and look at it and say 'espiabo,' which means 'thank you.' They were more pathetic than anything I have ever seen. I used to go down there to feed them and cry by the hour. What misery. Their little arms were mere sticks, their stomachs were bloated from eating clay, their eyes deep sunken. But after we had fed them a little while we could see their eyes become clear and their cheeks fill out a little and they got better. Those who could feed will live, the others will die, and at present we can feed only from 25 to 40 per cent.

"Women used to come in and beg for food for their children, but we did not have enough for all, and it was the hardest thing I ever did to refuse them. We gave them white bread nearly every day, rice pudding twice a week, beans twice a week and cocoa twice a week. That is not much, but it was luxury for them. "Camels Were My Only Comfort" "There was so little food in the district that after my beans ran out in the first few weeks I had only two meals a day, bread and soup. And I felt then as if I were robbing the people. The isolation was trying, for aside from my interpreter there was no other white man in the village. The camels were my only comfort. I always though camels needed a warm climate, but there were hundreds of them, and all were fat. How they kept fat I don't know although they would eat anything, even nails. When I got unusually downhearted, one of these ludicrous camels would bray and cheer me up. The people don't kill them because they are too valuable; they are the only means of transport left.

"There is absolutely no seed left in the district, and what the people will do for crops next year is more than I can see. On my trip out I did not see a single blade of winter wheat, and that section used to be the great granary of Europe." Mr. Floete was in Pugachov at the time a woman bandit, famous throughout all the Volga region as the companion of the Cossack chief Sarof, raided the town at the head of 500 other men and women Cossacks. The bandits took all the food and stores in the town, with the exception of American stores, which they did not touch.

"Wagons Were Not to be Touched" "We heard they were coming the day before," Mr. Floete said. "All the village officials, all the Communists, were much alarmed. All of the officials left town, only the Communist troops remaining. On the way in the Cossacks passed some of our wagons, but as soon as they learned who they belonged to they gave orders that the wagons were not to be touched. Sarof also told his band that anyone who went to the American warehouse would be shot.

"When they rode into town they were led by this woman, one of the most beautiful women I ever saw. I suppose she had charge of the women in the band. They were all dressed in sheepskins and rode splendid horses. There was no sign of famine among them, and I learned that they raided the country at will for food and other supplies, and that everybody was afraid of them.

"The troops put up a fight, but the Cossacks killed about fifty of them and then rode unmolested into town. They rifled all the government warehouses and took the little reserve supply of food. The chief wanted to see me, and I wanted to talk to him, but my interpreter had been praying constantly since he heard they were coming and that left me without anyone who could speak English. I did see the woman, however, and she was worth seeing, although while I was watching her it seemed that I must be at a melodrama and that it really wasn't true. After they had patrolled the streets until dark, they went off, taking their wagons and loot with them."

MULISH "A charger is a horse, isn't it, pa?" "Well, the greatest charger I ever saw was a mule; he was a plumber who positively refused to make any reduction in the amount of his bill."
