What Will Tomorrow's Daughter of Eve Be?

By MARGERY REX Written for International News Service

NEW YORK, Feb. 23.—What will tomorrow's daughter be? The romantic woman has gone. Who will take her place?

Woman today is in a state of transition. Appraisals are apt not to include perfect understanding of her. She is a specimen who moves too fast for scrutiny.

By tomorrow she will be molded into a mid-twentieth century type which may reveal the best traits of this moment with choice attributes culled from her past history.

But must we go back to ancient Greece to find a model for tomorrow? Mrs. Margaret Cullin-Banning, a gifted novelist from our own Northwest, has come from Duluth to tell us her views on woman's future. She says that our next kind of woman will be:

"Combination of Charm" "A combination of the charm of the romantic type with the mind we have now.

"A woman without today's sharpness and nervousness, with a mind incisive but not aggressive. I should like to pick out of the past a feminine figure of the sort.

"Sappho, the sweet singer of Greece, I believe, was that type."

In discussing her own sex, Mrs. Banning does not neglect to make the most of the opposite one as a basis of comparison, since man is always affected by woman's revolt.

"Women will go on making great progress," she predicts. "But they will continue to leave many mutilated men in their homes.

"Is there one of us who has suspected that her own self-sufficiency has left somewhere in its wake a bewildered, helpless man?"

"As a Man Thinketh"

But as a man thinketh in his own heart, so is he among his women-kind. This is the opinion of Miss Margaret Widdemer, well known poet and novelist, who has agreed to turn prophet for us in order to describe the woman of tomorrow.

Not a feminist, in so far as she knows, Miss Widdemer says she prefers to be a "humanist."

What this vivid young woman, who, nevertheless, describes herself as a mid-Victoria, thinks about her today. Our post-war type is not unlike the post-Napoleonic. Women today react from all the social conditions ending with the war.

"All Men Bewildered"

"All men are bewildered at present; all holding their heads. We women believe in the modern man, but a good many of us have come up against the unreconstructed ones.

"Of course the governing are always alarmed when the governed arise. Now, most women have attained to the belief that they are men's equals, except the fluffies ones, who always thought they were men's superiors."

"Were women ever really inferior?" she is asked.

"Dear me, I was brought up to believe it," says this young woman, who has achieved notable literary success in our day and remains the most gentle of Victorians. This state of mind she attributes to her rearing by grandparents, who naturally would be more remote from this generation of ours than parents.

"I am a hold-over or hang-over, whichever you like, from a former age," Miss Widdemer laughs, "and well pleased with my lot, I view this wonderful new world.

"Business of Charming" "I have seen many women of fine mental equipment and driving personality turning over every scrap of mind, body and intelligence to the business of charming men, even to the exclusion of remaining human beings.

"Women have been told they couldn't be both attractive and successful, and they believed it. But, of course, it can be done."

"Are women heady over their new success?" we asked.

"If that is true, it is quite natural. In fact, it should be true, because people freed from anything are at first apt to go too far," replied Miss Widdemer.

"Violent over-assertion is always a sign of not being sure of one's self." "The mid-Victoria woman seemed meek and mild. She let her husband tell her what cap to wear to breakfast. She loved and humored him, but laughed to herself. She loved the thrill his superiority gave her. 'My master,' she thought. Women still love to say that.

"She is not harder nor more brilliant than the hard brilliant man of sex does not lack interest. "The woman of the future," she says thoughtfully, "will be one who will not need to suppress any part of herself in order to develop any other part. She will have a chance. "Since women have got down into the fight she has lost some of her bird's-eye view of things.

"She is not harder nor more brilliant than the hard brilliant man of
