ASHLAND GIRL DIES IN SOUTH

Miss Ora Patrick, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Patrick, of Almond street, died Wednesday afternoon from an attack of pneumonia at a hospital at Palo Alto, Calif. Miss Patrick had been in the hospital only a few days, and the news of her death came as a surprise to her parents and friends. Leon Patrick, a brother, who is a physician in southern California, was called and was at the bedside when the end came, and will accompany the body to Ashland.

Definite information was not available as to the funeral arrangements when the Tidings went to press.

Mrs. Rupp's Story Fails to Hold Up

LOS ANGELES, March 2.—Members of the homicide squad of the detective bureau, working on the Taylor murder mystery, plunged into an entirely new theory as to the cause which led to the slaying of the motion picture director.

The officers would not indulge the new theory or the persons involved. The six men who were arrested on the strength of the story told by Mrs. John Rupp will probably be released today because the woman's story failed to hold up.

Ain't Nature Careless

(With Apologies to Walt Mason)

I USED to tune up my guitar and lamp the blank expression on her face. But why her ma who ain't so warble songs of praise about the female critter, in the good old by-gone days. I never ceased to wonder how Nature found the time to cut them out so beautiful and never jag a line.

But I no longer twit'er of the beauty that I meet; I swear that Nature's had home brew each time I walk the street. She cuts them out so wobbly, she's lost her eye for line; she hands them funny bulges and curves a wicked spine.

There used to be some mystery about the form divine and I could do some guessing and have a gaudy time. I didn't heed the sugly wheeze that things ain't what they seem; that jackdaws strut in peacocks' plumes and milk parades as cream. And so I went my gladsome way with songs of praise and busy eye, and told my friends they needn't doubt the fact that figures never lie.

But now the picture's badly smeared; dames look like sticks and custard pie. It may be Eve, cobby, do the stunt and not be hard upon the eyes; but Eve's own daughters seem to be too far removed to stand the guff and when they try that natural stuff they hand the passing gents a laff. The artless flapper when she flaps with powdered nose and rag doll gra-e shows why she does it if you'll

The people of Ashland must set these things right before the town could be expected to make the proper advancement. He then read letters received from a party who is interested in Ashland, the tone of which indicated that the writer was familiar with conditions here, and asked that certain things be done before he would consider bringing the big hotel man to our city.

He explained the work accomplished in the past and his connection with various parties with whom he worked during the time that the spring water was being brought to town. Various other matters were discussed for a short time, and in closing he asked that everyone work for the interest of a big hotel which he feels sure is just around the corner at the present time.

Mr. McCoy then took the floor in defense of the stand that he had taken in the various matters that days later a baby is born, but Mrs. Mattio is unable to care for it. So, on the advice of friends, she advertises for some family to care for the child.

"Four days," was the response. Whereupon Miss Ferriter promptly suggested that Mrs. Peck return to bed.

"Oh, no! In our family the women are always out of bed within a few days," is said to have been the reply.

But Miss Ferriter, disliking conditions in the house, investigated and found Mrs. Peck had recently adopted a child. Through the Maryland authorities she obtained the child's custody. It was later ordered sent and Mrs. Peck takes the girl to her home in Tuxedo. This was late in August.

But for the timely advent of Miss Agnes Ferriter, Red Cross worker in Prince George's county, the story probably would have ended here. Miss Ferriter learned that Mrs. Peck was ill in bed and decided to visit her.

Entering the house, she found Mrs. Peck and was informed that a baby had just been born.

"How old is this child?" asked Miss Ferriter.

to the custody of the Children's Guardians. By this time Mrs. Mattio had stepped into the picture.

Mrs. Peck followed the child to Washington and sought its custody from the board. But officials of the board decided it was a case for the juvenile judge, and the case was referred.

And today, a woman, fittingly appropriate in these modern days of suffrage and women's rights, will enact the role of Solomon the Wise in deciding who is the real mother of the baby.

Inscrutable Woman! Pretty Screen Star Lives All The Seven Ages in One by the Magic of Make-Up

"If I could only live my school days over," says Mrs. Brown. "My, but I wish I were older," sighs Mary.

And there you have the unfilled wishes of woman—and man for that matter—in all stages of life from the cradle age to the advanced stage.

There is one place, however, where women can gratify every desire for life in all its phases—the movies. May McAvoy, the pretty Paramount star, who will soon appear with Rodolph Valentino in the pictureization of Ibanez's novel, "Blood and Sand," illustrates in the pictures above how easy it is to span the seven ages of woman. By the aid of a few curls and the skillful use of grease paint she has successfully transformed her features. From wide-eyed babyhood she has traversed the path of the school girl, the flapper, the vamp, the sweetheart, the matron, to grandmother.

If, on a moment's notice, you could be transformed as easily as Miss McAvoy was, which one of these ages of woman would you choose? Miss McAvoy says she would like to be a perpetual school girl.

"That's the age when life has its lightest problems," she said. "One moves along the lines of least resistance and leans on father, mother and teacher for assistance over the bumps. Babyhood is attendant with teething, the measles, and more or less helplessness, while marriage brings other difficulties to surmount. It is the stage between these—girlhood—that goes smoothly and easily."
