Surgical Safety

The Ashland Sanitarium was established because there was no scientific equipment nor attempts to do thorough and careful work in any hospital in the Rogue River valley. As well and as rapidly as possible the Sanitarium was equipped with up-to-date surgical and diagnostic apparatus.

At the present time the Sacred Heart Hospital in Medford is well equipped in every particular. The pathologic and x-ray laboratories represent the very best in personnel and material. The surgical side of the institution will compare favorably with any.

The whole hospital has been reorganized and "standardized." The policies of the hospital are under the direct control of a staff of physicians selected from the Jackson county Medical Society. This supervision is so close that no operations which are not absolutely necessary and essential for the well-being of the patient are tolerated.

This means that every physician operating in this hospital is constantly subjected to constructive criticism and that no half-baked diagnosis is permitted and that no operation can possibly be "pulled off" which is not on an absolutely honest basis.

Whenever at all indicated such laboratory examinations as blood counts and x-ray studies must be made before operation. This conduces to the safety of the sick and forces all physicians to keep abreast of medical and surgical progress. This non-sectarian staff supervises all of the activities of the institution. One of the cardinal principles governing every "standardized" hospital is that no one man can do the best work and that free and frequent consultation is essential to the well-being of the sick and also to the scientific advancement of the physicians and surgeons.

To give the public the services of a hospital at least the equal of any in the state of Oregon is the reason why major operations done in the Rogue River valley should be done at the Sacred Heart hospital. With full support patients can have the best of board, room, and nursing at much less cost than in a smaller and non-standardized institution. Far from being closed, the Sanitarium has been improved and the X-ray facilities have been increased. Dr. Kallen wishes especially to announce that there has been no interruption in the X-ray laboratory service in Ashland, and that he will continue to have office hours at the Sanitarium from 1 to 5 p. m. DR. JARVIS.
