AND THEY SLEPT "UPSTAIRS" Childish Prank Not So Enjoyable as Youngsters Imagined It Was Going to Be.

An Indianapolis woman is fond of telling a story about her girlhood days. There were several children in the family and they went to school with other children, perhaps a grade better off as to this world's goods than they were. At any rate, the other children were always talking about their upstairs. And there was no upstairs to the cottage where the Indianapolis woman's family lived—it was only a cottage. But children-like, they had to be able to say with cool disdain when they went to school: "Why, upstairs where we sleep."

So when mother went downtown one day these small children laboriously took their little bed apart and carried it up the narrow, steep dark stairs that led to the attic. Then they carried up the bedclothes; then their little chairs. They were indeed, going to sleep upstairs. When mother came home she found out what had happened. She climbed the attic stairs, and there amid the dust and dirt and whatnots and cobwebs were the two beds. So just to punish the children for their disobedience mother made them sleep up there a few nights in the hot weather, until they were glad they had no "upstairs."

HAD HIGH RANK AS HUMORIST

William Everts "One of the Wittiest Men I Ever Met," Asserted Chauncey M. Depew.

"William M. Everts was the wittiest man I ever met," writes Chauncey M. Depew in Scribner's magazine. "It is difficult to rehabilitate in the sayings of a wit the complete flavor of the utterance. It is easier with a man of humor."

"Everts was very proud of his efforts as a farmer on his large estate in Vermont. Among his prizes was a drove of pigs. He sent to Chief Justice Morrison R. Waite a copy of his eulogy on Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase, Waite's predecessor, and at the same time a ham, saying in his letter: 'My dear chief justice, I send you today one of my prize hams and also my eulogy on Chief Justice Chase, both the products of my pen.'"

"The good things Mr. Everts said would be talked of long after a dinner. I remember on one occasion his famous partner, Mr. Choate, who was a Harvard man, while Everts was a graduate from Yale, introduced Mr. Everts by saying that he was surprised that a Yale man, with all the prejudices of that institution against the superior advantages of Harvard, should have risked the coats of his stomach at a Harvard dinner. Mr. Everts replied: 'When I go to a Harvard dinner I always leave the coats of my stomach at home.'"

Besides, it is hard to get now. "That's a bad cold you have, Mabel."

"Yes, Dorothy, it is." "What have you taken for it dearie?" "Everything." "In that case there's no use in me offering you any advice."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

We Ain't Got No "Poetry Type" Either

Ignorance Hard to Credit Superstitious Belief Almost Cost Woman in German Village Her Life, It is Reported.

To cast the devil out of a woman living in a village of the Lauenburger district of Pomerania, Germany, three hags tortured her. She appears to have been of a sour and somewhat hysterical disposition and three of the village gossips came to the conclusion that her feelings were due to diabolical possession and resolved to effect a cure by means of ancient enchantments known by them. It is reported. They first of all gathered the herbs needed for the purpose in the forests at the proper conjunction of the stars. Then a tripod was formed of three chairs and to these the patient was bound. Beneath her was placed a pall of red-hot coal on which the herbs were scattered. As the fumes of the burning weeds veiled the victim the three hags crooned the prescribed enchantment. The louder the woman shrieked the louder they sang, and after the process had been continued long enough to prove effective they ran away, believing the devil would run out of the woman after them. She, however, continued to shriek. Her cries were heard by a man who came to the rescue and unbound her.
