zens who had gathered to welcome them to Ashland. Prof. Vining made a happy welcoming speech, in which he expressed the sincere pleasure which the city received Sir Auckland and Lady Geddes, and regretted that there was not more time in which to show them the wonderful country. The ambassador replied with a short talk in which he expressed surprise at what had been accompished in the short time since the west had first begun to develop. He said he found the people of the west were broad-minded and liberal and that he could easily believe what he had frequently heard that, once a tizen of the west, one would never again be satisfied with the east. He also expressed the hope that the entire English-speaking people of the earth would come to a common understanding, as all have the same ideas and ideals, and all want to see peace all over the world.
