Under the Sheltering Parasol

TIME was, but not is, when the Fashionable One went out into the countryside to seek a coat of tan. Wind and sun she faced intrepidly and unshielded, and returned not into the city until she had obtained that coating upon which she had set her heart.

But now she burns not, neither does she tan. She no longer basks in the sun. She has found that a much burned skin soon turns leathery. And again, the lines of a bathing suit do not follow the lines of the evening gown; and where the swimming suit began and where it ended are stamped for all time on the fair skin.

So the parasol grows more and more important every summer, and madam spends the sunny hours under its shade.

and madam spends the sunny hours under its shade. One of the new parasols is shown in the lower left hand sketch. It is made of three layers of organdy. Two of white, and an under one of peach, which tints the complexion with a delicate glow. It is trimmed in organdy daisies.

In the photo, Agnes Ayres, the Paramount star, wears this hat and parasol in "Borderland," her latest starring picture for Paramount.

Hat and parasol are of waterproofed material, both trimmed in loops of ribbon, likewise waterproofed. This sort of parasol is extremely practical, and is pretty and useful in rain or shine. The parasol has an adjustable handle which enables it to be tilted at various angles, which is often desirable.
