Perpetual Lumber Supply Assured By Governmental Act

Sooner or later, the timber accessible to a sawmill becomes exhausted, says the forest service, United States department of agriculture. The operators are forced to junk a large part of their equipment, tear up their railroad tracks, abandon their roads, and move to other sources of supply. To the lumberman this means a loss of money and time; to the workers in mill and woods, it means either seeking other employment or new fields of activity; to the community it means a serious and sometimes a fatal setback.

Relief from these conditions, forest experts state, marks a recently proposed sale of national forest timber as the most unique offer ever made by the government to lumbermen. The timber to be placed on the market is within the Malheur national forest, Oregon, and the government proposes to open up the region on the basis of a perpetual supply of forest products. Forest service estimates show that 60,000,000 feet of yellow pine saw timber may be cut yearly for all time, thus insuring to the local industries the opportunity to have a continuous stream of raw material, permanent bases of operation and staple employment for woods and mill workers.

The area, which totals 550,000 acres and contains 6700 million board feet of saw timber is, according to foresters, one of the last great timbered regions in the United States to be opened up for industrial development.

The first unit to be put on the market is now being offered to the highest bidder and included 890,000,000 feet to be cut under a 20-year contract.
