THE MODERN VAGABONDS

CREATIONS OF THE SUMMER CAMP AND THE AUTO-RELATED BY ROBERT I. SNADJR IN THE CLEVELAND "PLAIN-DEALER," WHO PRAISES ASHLAND'S AUTO TOURIST CAMP

Time was when American vacationists, those who could not afford de luxe trips abroad, rolled to their destinations on wheels of steel. The family flivver was jacked up in the garage, covered with a tarpaulin, the battery carefully put to soak in a battery station. Destinations were studied, not routes particularly, and details gathered concerning accommodations.

But the war and the automotive era have changed all this, in fact have brought about a revolution; and the family car, once thrust aside as useless during vacation periods, now sparks a stellar role in all the plans of the householder bent on enjoying two or more weeks away from the office or shop.

In no previous vacation season have the roads leading westward been so choked with every make and model of automobile known to the American mechanical industry. The transcontinental highways, the Lincoln and the Dixie, the comparatively smooth pikes of the middle west, the winding passes of the Rockies, and the broad boulevards of California, Oregon and Washington have been alive with tourists, hundreds of thousands of them. The whole country has been in motion; and this is only the beginning. Next year, and the year after, will see such a hegebra as Mohammed never dreamed of, a migration beside which the wanderings of Asiatics, of Teutonic tribes, of Goths and Vandals and Huns, are but as the moving of urban families from one house to another.

If the question ever enters a controversial stage, there will be many claimants for the honor of being the first community to establish that latest entrant in the field of modern living, the auto camp. It isn't old, and yet there is none who can point to a city and say: "Here the first camp for automobile tourists was laid out." It seems to have been something that sprang up simultaneously, in the east, in the west, in the north and the south.

It was only a few years ago that the pioneers among the modern vagabonds were wont to pull up wearily just outside a town at the end of a long day's run, unpack and prepare for the night. If there was a stream hard by, so much the better. Wood was gathered, a fire built, and a simple meal cooked, generally before an interested group of spectators, young and old, from the town. More often than not the constable would come out and shoo the "gypsies" away. Maybe it would be the motorist had camped for the night. Decidedly it was not all beer and skittles.

But now! Take the camp at Ashland, Or., for instance; generally conceded by automobile tourists to be as nearly perfect as an auto camp can be. Instead of designating a barren piece of land on the outskirts of town, Ashland placed its camp in the very center of its prettiest park. There are tents and cabins available at a very nominal fee, a fee that was imposed, oddly enough, because the campers did not avail themselves of the privilege when offered a roof for nothing.

Those who wish to erect their own tent are escorted by the superintendent of the camp to a site under great trees, carefully cleared, and usually surrounded by undergrowth dense enough to insure privacy. Gas has been piped into the park so that the women members of the party can cook their meals once more on a stove. Water is available everywhere, and a huge spring on the grounds acts as an admirable ice box for milk, watermelons, meat, and what not. Grocery and butcher wagons come direct to the park. At night lectures of various kinds, and concerts are given. Motion pictures are also shown. Moreover, Ashland has a feature unique among auto camps. It has free lithia, soda and sulphur springs, all bubbling up within a few feet of each other.

The superintendent, a former lecturer on the Chautauqua circuit, living an outdoor life because of shattered health, says:

"Our camp is our greatest advertising medium. The west needs settlers, and Ashland is of the west. These people are our prospective settlers. If we had no camp, the town would be overrun with tourists, stoppin here and there, littering up everything with their empty tins and papers, pestering people for water and in general making a nuisance of themselves. Here we have them under our eyes, and not only does the close association break down old prejudices and sectional misunderstandings, but it enables us to get them together in order that we may make our pleas asking them to consider making their home in the west."

There is scarcely a town in the length and breadth of California that does not make some provision for the travelers who roll in at nightfall. They are not all as comfortable as the one at Ashland, but all that is asked is that a modicum of privacy be assured, together with water and shade. Nothing more. In some places, as at Yreka, quaint old mining town, with its narrow streets, Bret Harte architecture, and huge piles of gravel, there are platforms and other facilities for repairing and washing automobiles. At Chico, a magnificent grove of oaks, containing, among others, what is said to be the largest oak in the world, lures the tourist. At Pasadena, Brookside park, set prettily in an immense arroyo, with swimming pool and playground for children, beckons—and so it goes.

There are, of course, thousands of motorists who speed over the roads in their expensive cars, who roll up at dusk before the best hotel in town, order the driver to take the car around to a garage, and then stalk into the hotel with a demand for a suite or two, baths, hot water and all the conveniences of civilization. But not for your auto camper. He shaves with cold water, and bathes either in a mountain stream or steps in the rude showers that have been built at the camp. Instead of a hotel lobby after the evening meal he either strolls through the town or else gets into conversation with the family next to him. Cars, roads, destinations, detours, mileage—these form a topic, and by 9 o'clock, when the "royal" tourist is getting ready to attend a dance, the average auto camp is as silent as an army in bivouac. By 7 o'clock most of these people are on the way again, heading north, south, east, west, but ever heading somewhere.

Speaking generally, the people who have been on the road this summer have never been from home before. Good roads, cheap automobiles, and an itching desire to see something of the country, have lured them forth. They are eager, restless, amiable. Like the doughboys in France, they address each other familiarly along the roads and at the stopping places. Some of them have been on the go for months. There was a family at Redding that had been touring for 18 months, and expected to tour as many more, if necessary, until a daughter of 13, a victim of tuberculosis, was entirely well. Before this family had left Iowa, its members had never been more than 50 miles away from home. Now it had gone through the Yellowstone, Glacier national park, across Canada, and down the Pacific slopes. Everybody in the entourage, including a two-year-old, that had been spending most of the summer in a single diminutive suit of unionalls, was bronzed to a golden brown nicety, and radiated health and sparkling eyes.

Experts agree that the migration of America is only in its infancy. Perchance there will be grumbling employers who can see no sense in a month's vacation, but the resulting benefit in a more wide-awake, better educated and healthier nation of individuals will more than offset a four-weeks lay off from the daily routine of the shop or office. Perhaps the European is right when he accuses America of being provincial, but the European will have to change his opinion within the next five years, for narrow visioned sectionalism, with its Main streets, its suspicions, its selfishness, and above all, its general ignorance, is doomed.

Meighan in Pensive Mood

SOME people gaze at the moon when they are feeling pensive, but Thomas Meighan has a moon of his own in "The Man Who Saw Tomorrow," a new Paramount picture, in which he is starred. It is said to be better than a ouija board for finding out what is going to happen on the morrow. The story is by Perley Poore Sheehan and Frank Condon and it is being directed by Alfred E. Green.

Excellent Talent Obtained—

Fifty Medford business men have entered into a co-operative agreement to guarantee sufficient money to obtain three talented artists to appear in the city at various times during the winter. Major Powell, nationally noted lecturer, will be the first attraction, on October 27. Others who will appear later are the Laurence Concert company, November 14, and Arthur Middleton, of the Metropolitan Opera company, baritone, January 8. Season tickets have been placed at a very low figure, $3 covering the three numbers. All of the performances will be given at the Page theatre.
