CHAPTER III
THE HIDDEN THING

Pearl Travers did not need a second invitation from her mysterious young friend, as the flames in the tower were getting hotter and hotter. After measuring the distance from the window ledge to the tree, she jumped, and was followed immediately by "Mr. Jones." Then the two prisoners climbed quickly to the ground and scurried away from the burning building toward a shed. A motorcar, unattended, was standing nearby.

"Now, listen," commanded the mysterious "Jones," "Deering's on his way to see that queer doctor—Professor Eichner—at Riverdale. Eichner is the owner of ten shares of Central Building stock. You want that stock and so does Deering. That is why he tried to detain you here. Take this car—perhaps you can beat him to Eichner's."

"But," the girl interrupted, "why can't you come along?" The young man looked away uneasily. "I—I cannot go with you—now," he replied. "I've something more important to attend to, so you'll have to go alone. Here," he continued, taking an automatic from his pocket, "take this—you may need it."

Meanwhile, at his home at Riverdale, Professor Eichner paced up and down nervously and glanced at the clock. The Professor, although a skilled scientist, was shunned by his friends for reasons that these same friends only dared whisper. At one end of the room, was a door, with iron bars over a small opening in the upper panel. Eichner walked to this door occasionally and dropped a piece of meat in.

"Deering should be here by now," he finally said, turning to his housekeeper. "Is the front door locked? Are the downstairs windows locked? Is the cellar locked? 'Everything,' she replied, 'but the door that leads—'"

"You know how he has threatened me, don't you?" Eichner interrupted. "This is my house, is it not? I will not be responsible if he enters by that back door! All he wants is my Central stock, and that I would sell him gladly but he knows what I have hidden in the cave under the river. I cannot be safe while anybody knows of that thing!"

And meanwhile, the very man who was the topic of his conversation was seeking a means to enter the house. Deering approached the rear, and saw a door left open. He peered in, smiled to himself, and passed by it. Looking above, over a small porch, he saw an open window. This would serve him better. In a very short time he presented himself to the surprised scientist.

"So you thought I'd come in by the unlocked door and get into the next room, eh?" he grinned, pointing a finger toward the grilled door. "And then, quickly changing the subject, he asked, 'Well, what have you decided about your shares of stock in the Central Building?'"

Eichner's mouth twitched nervously. "Suppose," he replied, "suppose I sell you my stock, how am I to know that you will keep quiet about it—about the cave—and what is in it—under the river?"

About the same time that this interesting but mysterious conversation was going on, Pearl Travers was reconnoitering around the old house. She had seen Jude Deering examine the place, and she could not understand why he had avoided the open door and climbed to the second floor to make his entrance. Pearl drew the automatic from her pocket and cautiously entered.

She made her way down a small hallway, and then entered a room where hay had been thrown around on the floor. At one end she saw a door with a barred window in the top panel. The girl approached it to look in the next room. Suddenly she whirled in her tracks! Something had moved behind her! Looking into the darkest corner of the tiny room, she saw two bright eyes gleaming at her—a giant gorilla.

Pearl wanted to cry out in fright, but the words were frozen on her lips. Then the gorilla slowly approached her. The girl sprang to another corner of the room, but in her haste she dropped the revolver. But the beast suddenly stopped, gazed at the automatic, fascinated, and picked it up. Then, with the cool deliberation of a human, he aimed it at the girl. At the same time, Pearl was unconsciously pointing her finger at the gorilla.

ger at the gorilla. Suddenly believing that the beast was mimicing her, she pointed her finger at her temple and bent her forehead a number of times, giving the impression that she was pulling the trigger. The gorilla did likewise. There was a sharp explosion and the beast dropped dead at her feet.

In Eichner's laboratory, Deering was just offering the scientist a check for his stock when both heard the report and stood transfixed. Eichner, unable to understand what had happened, rushed to the door, opened it, and saw Pearl standing in fright. She leaned against the wall trembling and told them what had happened. Deering was the first to recover.

"Your Mr. Jones played you a nice trick, didn't he?" he sneered. "He knew what you'd meet in this room—that's why he wouldn't come with you!"

Eichner finally began cursing the girl for the death of his ape, and shaking with fury, he cried: "I know you want my stock, too! Well, I will sell you nothing though you have a million dollars to buy it with! Get out of here before I forget that you are only a fool!" Pearl gladly took the opportunity, and fled from the place the same way that she had entered.

I am not myself, Mr. Deering," Eichner finally said. "Wait a while and pledge me that you will keep my secret—about the cave—and I will make the stock transaction with you."

Now all the time that this was going on, an intruder had succeeded in entering the house and leaving with a large envelope in his hand—"Mr. Jones." As he left, Pearl Travers was making her hasty exit, and seeing the mysterious young man, she decided to watch him closely.
