ACE THINKS FLYING COMMON BEFORE LONG

AKRON, Ohio, July 16.—Major Eddie Rickenbacker, famous ace, got up the other morning in Mt. Clemens, Mich., at his breakfast, went to his office and opened his morning mail. At 9:45 a. m. he went to a flying field and boarded his plane, "Spark Plug."

In an hour and fifty minutes he was shaking hands with Akron, O., officials at Stow Field, 150 miles away from his starting point.

And that's what will be happening daily in these United States in a few years," Rickenbacker remarked casually, as he prepared for a speech a few hours later.

"The day is not far away when every city of size will own its own municipal flying field," he continued. "In 25 years planes will drop down and take on gas and undergo repairs just as autos do now. In a quarter of a century aviation will be the leading means of travel. An air-its atmosphere.

STOPPED HIS PAINS

"I was suffering with a severe cold, headache, backache and pains in my abdomen," writes J. B. Dring, Newport, R. I. "After taking Foley's Honey and Tar in conjunction with Foley Cathartic Tablets I was entirely relieved of my cold and pains." Coughs resulting from Bronchitis, Asthma, Hay Fever, Croup and Whooping Cough are quickly relieved with Foley's Honey and Tar. The largest selling cough medicine in the World. Sold everywhere.

CHAPTER V

TO BEAT A KNAVE

The mysterious "Mr. Jones" became infuriated, panic-stricken, when he beheld the crafty Professor Eichner approaching the girl he loved with the sinister bottle held high over his head. The young man drew back to the far corner of his strange imprisonment and dashed against the door, throwing his entire weight on it.

There was a terrific crash, and the door was torn from its hinges, falling on the scientist and pinning him underneath it. "Mr. Jones" picked himself up off the floor and examined Eichner. The man was only slightly stunned. Then, turning to Pearl Travers, "Jones" said: "Come! Grab those stock certificates and let's get out of here! We might as well be on our way!"

And now, before going into Pearl's next exploit for the accumulation of the precious, Central Building certificates, it is necessary to observe closely the home of Stephen de Lissa.

Mrs. de Lissa, a stunning woman, was seated in the handsome living room in an attitude of desperation. Now and then she would pace up and down nervously, and become started at the slightest noise. There was a reason for the charming lady's anxiety. Mrs. de Lissa had played the market heavily, much against her husband's wishes, and had lost. A smooth bucket-shop swindler had threatened her with exposure if she would not turn fifty thousand dollars over to him.

That morning, her husband had entrusted her with a beautiful emerald pendant, which she was to give her daughter that night when the girl's engagement would be announced. Shortly after this, Etheridge, the swindler, had made his appearance and again threatened her with exposure. Fearing the wrath of her husband, the unfortunate woman in desperation had silenced the bucket-shop gentleman by turning over the emerald pendant to him.

It was no wonder then that Mrs. de Lissa was in a nervous state of mind. What would she do that night when the pendant should be presented? How could she—But her thoughts were put to rout by the sudden ring of the door-bell, and then the entrance of the butler. A Mr. Deering was announced, and a moment later that worthy gentleman entered and bowed in a courtly manner to the lady.

"I understand," he began, "that you own stock in the Central Building, and I desire to buy it. Money is no object."

Mrs. de Lissa looked at her caller curiously, then an idea struck her. "Can I tell you something in absolute confidence?" she asked Deering. The gentleman nodded. And then, in very few words, Mrs. de Lissa informed him of her plight—the emerald pendant—and how much depended on its return.

"You get that emerald pendant for me," she finished, "and I promise, on my word of honor, that the Central Stock will be turned over to you."

Deering agreed. He took down Etheridge's address and departed. But a new contestant was about to enter the intrigue. Hardly had Deering left when Pearl Travers drove up to the de Lissa home in her roadster. And so to Pearl Travers, also seeking Central Building stock, Mrs. de Lissa confided the same proposition as to Deering. The girl agreed to it, darted from the house, and plunged headlong down an embankment. But to return to Jude Deering, we find that suave party bargaining with Etheridge, while three of the swindler's associates listened. Etheridge did not seem to be greatly interested in Deering's proposition. "I don't have to sell this back to Mrs. de Lissa or anyone else for fifty thousand dollars," he said. "It's mine now—I can sell it for what I please."

Deering was furious, but he raised his offer to fifty-five thousand. Again Etheridge remained obdurate and apparently uninterested.

"Sixty-five thousand!" Deering raised.

"Lissa's a piker, gentlemen! I'll make it seventy-five!"

The men in the room whirled about and saw Pearl Travers driving smiling in the doorway.

"Who are you?" asked Etheridge a look of admiration on his face.

"I am Pearl Travers," came the answer.

Deering was infuriated. "I'll make it eighty-five thousand!" he roared. "One hundred thousand!" the girl bid calmly.

"One hundred and ten thousand!" Deering raised.

"One hundred and twenty-five thousand!"

The bidding continued until Pearl's bid reached two hundred thousand dollars. This was too much for Deering. Boiling with rage he gave up. The girl calmly wrote out a check and handed it to Etheridge, who turned over the emerald pendant. Then, turning to Deering, he said:

"Say, Deering, could you use a paste replica of this pendant? I've had one made so's my wife could sport it while I kept this one in the vault. How much for the paste one?"

Deering was overjoyed. "I'll give you ten thousand for it," he said, "providing you detain Miss Travers here—as your guest, mind you, until noon tomorrow."

It was the girl's turn to register dismay. However, before anyone could make a move, she turned and raced for the door, pendant in hand. Etheridge was too quick for her, and aided by his two associates he succeeded in blocking her exit.

"Surely, you don't object to being my guest, Miss Travers," he smiled. "A mere formality, you know. Just till we get your check certified. Maybe you're not Miss Travers, eh?"

Pearl's objection proved futile. The men departed and left her locked in the room. The girl was furious. She tugged at the door-knob, but it was of no avail. Finally Pearl got an idea. She turned her attention to a bric-a-brac cabinet against the wall. At length she managed to tip it, and with a crash it fell to the floor.

The noise startled Etheridge and his associates, who immediately rushed upstairs. Pearl waited behind the door, and as the men locked past her, she darted out, locking them in the room. The girl fairly flew down the stairs in her haste, and out the front door. Her car stood nearby, but looking up the driveway, she saw a motorcycle—she would be able to get underway quicker with the latter. In another moment the girl was speeding up the road endeavoring to overtake Deering.

Deering, however, was riding along, snugly satisfied with himself and the fact that he had in his pocket a replica of the emerald pendant. It meant much to him—more stock in the building in his possession—and brought him nearer to the fabulous wealth that awaited the party who could control the Central Building.

Glancing back, he saw Pearl Travers, a short distance down the road but gradually overtaking him on the motorcycle. He shouted for the chauffeur to put on more speed, but even the Pearl seemed to gain. The next moment found them both racing onward—neck and neck. Deering's man attempted to crowd Pearl off the road, but she managed to skim by, just ahead of him.

The girl could not help but look back and laugh at her enemy—a laugh of triumph. But the laugh was her downfall, for she did not see that the road was boarded up, ahead of her and with a crash she collided with the heavy timbers and plunged headlong down an embankment. It was Deering's turn to laugh, as he whizzed by.

But Pearl was not beaten yet. Stunned and dizzy she picked herself up and resumed the chase. The girl Deering's proposition—a path which was not wide enough for Deering's car. On she speeded, hoping to reach the de Lissa home before her enemy. Her efforts were soon rewarded, for five minutes later found her running up the stone steps. Mrs. de Lissa was anxiously awaiting the girl. She gave a glad cry when Pearl handed her the case with the emerald pendant.

"Come in the house, my dear," she said, "and I will arrange for the transfer of this stock."

But at that moment, Deering's car drove up, and that worthy gentleman got out and started toward them.
