CHAPTER XIII
THE SWAMP OF LOST SOULS

When "Mr. Jones" looked up and saw the octopus waist of the girl he loved, he plunged fearlessly at the devil-fish, landing squarely on its cruel head. The denizen of the deep suddenly released the girl and started after the young man. Pearl Travers immediately took advantage of the opportunity and lifted herself upwards, through the trap-door. Then, seeing her revolver lying on the floor, she quickly seized it and began to pump lead through the trap-door at the octopus. The enormous creature began to writhe and squirm in pain. "Jones" saw his chance and swam quickly past it. Pearl saw him coming and dropped the end of a blanket down through the aperture. The young man seized it and climbed up to safety.

Before either of them could make a move, Fucheros and his companions began battering on the door of the room with an axe. Pearl recovered her senses first and crashed a chair through the barred window. Assisted by "Mr. Jones" she dropped from the window and ran down the alleyway. Ahead of them, the two young people saw the Three Men From Afar disappearing into the jungle, and, knowing they had some of the coveted stock certificates, "Jones" urged the girl to more speed.

In the general room, Fucheros halted his men who wished to continue the chase. "Wait, wait, my friends," he counseled. "It is better we are rid of them all." A servant came quietly up to the innkeeper and whispered: "Senor, I saw with my own eyes your daughter, Benita, unlock the door which let the American girl out. And with my own eyes I saw her give the American girl a pistol—I swear it!"

Fucheros' eyes were beady and cruel and he looked around at his daughter, but as their glances met his expression became kind and gentle. He pinched her cheek playfully, stroked her hair and drew her aside.

"Darling, mia," he smiled, "I wish to see you alone. Will you go upstairs and wait for me?" The girl, fearful, did as he requested.

Farther in the jungle, Pearl and her champion were following the foot tracks of the Three. Both were highly excited, and could hardly wait for the time when they would overtake their enemies. "See? It is easy to follow them!" "Jones" exclaimed. "If they get away from us now, the treasure is lost forever."

But Pearl suddenly stopped in her tracks. "I can't—I can't go on," she said. "I can't go away and leave that girl, Benita, to that old beast, Fucheros. If he finds out she helped us, he'll kill her!"

"But if we lose these Three, we lose everything," "Jones" argued. "More than one life depends on it." Pearl determined to aid the girl. "That girl stood by me," she replied, "and I'm going to stand by her—treasure or no treasure. I'm going back. You go on and we'll follow you. Do it that way, please, because I ask it!" She continued to plead lovingly with the young man and finally won her point. After kissing Pearl, "Jones" left her and pressed on into the jungle.

When Pearl returned to Jo Fucheros' place, she heard strange sounds coming from a room. "It was you, little one," a cruel voice was saying, "who let the American girl free? I promised you something, eh, if you should be so indiscreet as to interfere?" A scream followed. That was enough for Pearl. She rushed into the inn, dashed up the stairs into the room with her pistol drawn. Arriving on the scene just as Fucheros was about to strike the girl with a whip, Pearl struck him over the head with the butt of her revolver. With a groan, Fucheros sank to the floor. Then she turned to Benita. "Come," Pearl said, "you can't stay here—you'll have to come with me! I'll take care of you, and I'll see your help. You know the jungle." Gratefully, Benita followed her from the house.

THE LONG EXPECTED

The Famous Georgia Minstrels are due for an appearance at the Vining Tuesday, July 31st, bringing a company of forty fun makers, musicians, singers and dancers, and fifteen vaudeville acts in a program entirely different from anything ever seen in a minstrel performance.

That minstrelsy is again becoming the popular amusement of the American stage is shown by the crowded houses being given all similar organizations.

There must be something to attract people to the theater from the fact the Famous Georgia Minstrels have weathered the storms of over thirty three years continuous travel—there must certainly be merit back of all this, and while they have the regulation band parade, it is a frequent thing that when the company arrives in town, they find the seats are all sold in advance. The reputation of the company must have a whole lot to do with this.
