CHAPTER XV A KING'S RANSOM

"Mr. Jones," his friend, Rory Manton, and their followers returned to the plantation just in time to hear a terrific explosion in the storehouse. They rushed to the spot and fire repelled them as they scurried around the rear. Here they found Pearl Travers endeavoring to separate herself from the wreckage. "Jones" clutched her to his breast and inquired frantically if she were hurt.

"I'm just a bit shaken up, dear, I guess, and a little dirty," the girl answered, "but I think that our three friends are done for. I got one of them with this gun and I'm sure the other two were killed by the explosion."

The next morning, the two young people prepared for the trip to Salabance to take the boat for New York. Manton said goodbye a bit tearfully and mumbled something about giving his respects to Broadway. And so, enthusiastic for the last lap of their adventure, and eager to begin the treasure hunt, "Jones" and Pearl said goodbye to Malata.

The port was reached without further adventure, and that night found the two people aboard ship, curiously enough, both occupying only one deck chair in a dark corner of the deck.

"I suppose, dear," Jones was saying, "the very funniest thing about all this mystery business of mine, as you call it, is the fact that my name really and truly is Jones!"

"Oh, but sweetheart!" laughed Pearl, "that is now my favorite name. There's just one thing more that needs explaining, Jonesey, mia. How did you know, when you told me to have nothing whatever to do with Deering, that he was such a bad egg?"

"Well," the young man began, "when I came from Malata to New York to see if I could recover this treasure, I stole into the sub-cellar of the Central Building to see what the chances were for sinking a shaft. And there I suddenly bumped into old Michaelson, superintendent of the building. He was just coming up out of a deep hole he had dug, and a lot more were taken from an ancestor of mine about three hundred and fifty years ago. I have some claim, you know."

"Well, to shorten things a bit, the old boy took me to a small room of his to talk it over. The first thing I knew, the door was slammed behind me and I was a prisoner. And then steam—hot steam—suddenly began to flood the place. I guess I must have dropped unconscious, but the old boy repented and dragged me to his filthy room down on West street, near the Central Building."

"I found myself there on a pallet of rugs in a corner, all swathed in bandages he had put on over some grease. Oh, it must have been days after my tropical Turkish bath."

"And then Deering came. I guess he was just a bum getting a night's lodging, but he heard Michaelson raving about his treasure. That was fatal for the old man, and after Deering had left with the full information I crawled over and listened to the old fellow's last words."

"I'm done," he mumbled. "The diamonds are yours.....and the treasure.....get that guy.....make him pay!"

"Well, sweetheart, I got out of there that night, although it nearly killed me and two weeks later I got on the track of Deering through his efforts to buy Central Building stock. That's how I met you."

"Then," the girl replied softly, "then, the treasure, from every angle, is yours."

"Our?" smiled Jones. And the missing stevedore also smiled at what he saw—another shipboard romance, was his thought.

The theory is a blow to sportsmen who have been telling us that nothing equals physical exercise to maintain good health. How can one believe this when librarians arrive at the age of 90 sitting in an armchair?

"Paris Besieged"—Under this title an illustrated magazine of London calls attention to the affluence of American tourists in the French capital.

"One sees no one but Americans, one hears only their harsh nasal accent, with only rarely a word of pure English and a little smattering of French. Elsie Janis is doing the same old dance at the Alhambra, Pear White scarcely ever leaves Paris and the celebrated Ritz bar, where the latest European and New York scandals are hashed over, and any old day one can see the eternal youthful Fanny Ward."

L'Oeuvre wonders if, after all, English visitors are here in fewer numbers than their American cousins. Every bank holiday sees them in swarms around the Place de l'Opera in their smart tweeds and woolen stockings, looking as if they were ready for the Moors instead of fashionable Paris. At any rate, the French refuse to take sides in the debate and only feel flattered over the attraction which their city exerts over the people from across the Channel and the At-

The "America" was the talk of the Salon d'Horticulture in the Cours la Reine on the banks of the Seine. There were roses of every kind and quality, enormous double ones almost as large as a small cabbage—the famous "rose Leveque," the "Queen Alexandra," a "Madame Poincare"—but the "America" was the unique flower of the exposition.

It was a rose with petals which never fall, but fade upon the stem. It came from the other side of the Atlantic, of course, and will soon be in all the Paris flower shops.

College conductors are to be seen on many of the Paris motor-buses and streetcars during rush hours, between 5 and 8 p. m. The ten francs offered for the supplementary work go a good way toward a dinner for a hungry college man whose budget is small. As the season advances they take their places on the big omnibuses used for Sunday outings to surrounding villages and resorts. For the whole day run the company offers about $2. The work is neither difficult nor disagreeable, and calls mainly for great patience, good temper and gentle handling of French.

HOUSEWORK IS A BURDEN Woman's lot is a weary one at best. But with backache and other distressing kidney ills life indeed becomes a burden. Doan's Kidney Pills have made life brighter for many Ashland women. Ask your neighbor.

Mrs. L. Wertz, 129 5th St., Ashland, says: "Doan's Kidney Pills helped me when my kidneys were out of order and I am glad to recommend them. I had dull pains across the small of my back that made it hard for me to do my work and my kidneys acted irregularly. Doan's Kidney Pills soon freed me from the backaches and put my kidneys in good order."
