Daily News Letter

PARIS, Sept. 13.—Take a holiday in the subway, suggests a writer for the Paris "Presse" to the many unfortunate Parisians who are obliged to remain in the city during the summer heat. The subterranean regions, called the "Metro" in these parts, are almost as cool as any seaside resort, if not quite so airy. For the price of six sous, or two cents one can travel fifty four miles by following connections carefully. The scenery may be a bit monotonous, he agrees, but one can get plenty of good exercise travelling up and down the stairs and jumping on moving cars.

Americans lead the world in air travel, according to statistics just compiled by the French aerial navigation service. Of all the air passengers who left Le Bourget flying field near Paris during the month of July last, 47 per cent were Americans. The next largest number came from the British, 39 per cent. Only 6 per cent were French citizens.

Recently the Alliance Republicaine of deaf mutes visited the large aviation field at Le Bourget under the supervision of Adolphe Cheron. About fifty of the members received their initial baptism to the air. When asked his impressions during the flight, the president of the Alliance replied: "I have no words to express it," and another made a sign to indicate that he was speechless with enthusiasm.

An airplane is the best kind of insecticide, say the authorities at the Paris flying fields. It destroys bugs and insects by the millions. Upon the airships which enter the fields after a long flight are to be found many, many tiny spots of blood with numbers of insects' legs of every size clinging to them. Curious detail, one never finds the wings and bodies of these victims which are struck violently by the propeller and often sucked into the inner machinery. Sometimes thousands of flies introduce themselves into the carburetor and prevent the machine from retaking flight. Thus an insignificant little insect is able to immobilize hundreds of horsepower.

American tourists will be grateful to Dr. Felix Regnault, who has just discovered a new method of avoiding seasickness. In reality, it is a new sport called "amarinago" and consists of gymnastic exercises with the legs and torso, which are capable of rendering the most rebellious stomachs rough and ready on an ocean voyage.

"It's all very well for the amarinago," says L'intransigeant, "but haven't we already the tango, the shimmy and the roulroul—and these names are infinitely more beautiful."

Hot August days brought out the professional dog-bathers along the Seine banks. Before the war this was a regular Parisian industry, but during the busy days no one had time to think of Fido's bath. Now, many of the Parisians who bring along their pets and turn them over to the old gentleman who gives them a good wash and clean-up while the crowd stands around and watches. Like everything else, the price of a dog-bath has gone up. Before the war ten cents was paid for a bath and another ten cents was paid for a brush down. Today a good wash and brush-up cost five times this amount.

A swarm of bees invaded a baker's shop in the Avenue Bougeaud last week and kept all the clients at a distance during three hours while they sampled the cakes. The distracted proprietor appealed for help to the local police and the bees must have got wind of it, for they dragged their feet out of the jam tarts and flew away before the authorities arrived on the spot.

Would-be suicides who are contemplating the Seine for a watery grave are advised by one of the French papers to make up their minds definitely before they jump in. It is an important item to the rescuer, for if he fishes out a real "deadend" he draws 50 francs, but only 15 francs if the desperate one is just wet.

The Paris mosque, the foundation of which was laid last year, is gradually beginning to take shape and show passersby what it will be when finished. Six Arab mosaic experts from Fez are already at work on the walls and others are to follow as soon as the masons and plasterers finish their work. In addition to the great mosque itself, there will be Moorish baths, lecture rooms, library quarters and a cafe, which will become a center to the glory of all the followers of Allah.

While excavating between two small houses in the Rue Bourgon, workmen came upon a head, then smaller bones, another head, then finally upon what amounted to be the skeletons of five women. To one of the skulls hair was still clinging and it is believed that their inhumation goes back about fifteen years. The inhabitants of the quarter have been scratching their heads and remember now that at this time an old character lived in a little cabin near the same spot and was evidently a precursor of the famous Bluebeard—Landru.
