NEWS LETTER

LONDON, May 7.—George Bernard Shaw vs. Winston Churchill. A battle royal in words between these two contestants has gone two rounds of 3,000 words, each with no decision, except the full approval of the English reading public of the entertainment of fered.

Churchill, who has been a rather consistent baiter of the Socialists since Labor took office and who was recently defeated for Parliament on an anti-Socialist ticket, opened the attack and Shaw jumped into the fray with the greatest pleasure.

The battle was fought in the columns of a Sunday newspaper. Churchill broke into print first with a denunciation of the Socialist program.

Shaw countered with the following jab from the shoulder:

"One of the facts that threatens the continued existence of this happy-go-lucky nation is that it is possible for so distinguished a member of its governing class as Mr. Winston Churchill to write about Socialism at this time of day like an extremely decayed gentlewoman in an inaccessible remote village in a prehistorically backward district of Poland."

Churchill lunged with a dash into economic and declared that if there were less work, shorter hours and longer vacations, he couldn't understand why the Socialists held that there would be more to distribute among the workers.

"No doubt he does not understand the apparent miracle, but it happens," countered Shaw. "The history of organized labor for the last hundred years has been one of higher wages, shorter hours, less work, longer holidays and greatly increased product."

"But that proves only that our capitalists, when they were given carte blanche to exploit the working classes ruthlessly, could not do even that job properly and had to be feared by our factory legislation to stop killing the geese that laid the golden eggs and using up nine generations of men in one generation. It is clear that the formula will not work beyond a certain point. Let me, therefore, amend it by a Socialist addition or two. First, get rid of idlers and slackers, rich and poor, as we did during the war. Then take all the labor that is being wasted on the idlers and employ it productively."

"If Mr. Churchill cannot understand why this should result in less work, shorter hours and longer holidays for everybody, then it is his understanding that is at fault and not Socialism."

Up to now Shaw has the advantage of having struck the last blow, but nobody imagines that Churchill is through. This battle promises to run into a million words or more, and then probably will only be stopped by laryngitis or an ink drought.

Ishbel MacDonald, daughter of the Prime Minister, is running Princess Mary and Duchess of York closely for the popularity honors in England. Three months ago she was a simple university girl; now she is perhaps more feted and sought than any other girl in England. She has been a guest with Princess Mary on several occasions at public functions and has made her first public speech, perhaps with some timidity, but a sound speech, showing much of her mother's plain sense and intelligence. Notwithstanding her great and sudden popularity she still maintains her balance and has not allowed popularity to cause her to become a stilted young person of importance. She still displays simple charms and curiosity, delving deep into the lower regions of battleships and insisting on fondling babies at hospital bazzars and doing just the things she did when she was only the daughter of a Scotch labor leader.

A Duke has broken into Fleet street, at least into the edge of it. The Duke of Northumberland who is head of a group that has acquired the "Morning Post," is the first Duke ever to enter the English newspaper field.

The Duke has been an inveterate writer of letters to the newspapers on any and all subjects.

"What's in a name?" Jean Vere de Vere has been fined five shillings in a London court for begging.
