DO YOU REMEMBER THE CARRIER BOYS?

In many cities there exists a custom among subscribers of newspapers which is worthy of adoption wherever it does not prevail.

This is the remembrance of the newspaper carrier boys Christmas eve. A small present with a word of Christmas greeting does the trick which makes the boys know that you appreciate their effort to get the newspaper to you.

Fortitude and manliness is probably no place better illustrated than in the faithful newspaper carrier boy. Days when it is raining, you rush home after office hours and, sitting in the protection of your house, read the newspaper which the youngster has brought to you, even though he had to become drenched in doing it.

Days like the last week, with snow and ice on the ground, the carrier boy has brought your newspaper, even though he had to leave his "bike" behind and trudge through the snow and slush, with his ears and feet chilled and biting.

Isn't this service worthy of a little remembrance from you, Mr. Tidings Subscriber.

BAITING JAPAN

That there should be among the six hundred members of Congress at least one wild man at any time need not be surprising. It happens at this juncture that the hysterical person occupies the position of chairman of the House naval committee, and in this capacity gives dignity to resolution calling for a conference of the "white" nations on the Pacific to withstand alleged Japanese menace.

Such an action as this, if given official status by the United States government, would definitely cross the line of international conduct which the United States has so far distinctly avoided. We have maintained that immigration into the United States was a domestic issue, not to be even discussible with a foreign power in formal terms. We have for many years taken the formal position that we would not admit to citizenship certain peoples. This rule has never been questioned, no nation caring to claim, even, that the alienation of its citizens could be construed as a "right." Now the United States goes further and declares that certain persons shall not be admissible as settlers. It is willing to receive them as travelers, as students, as temporary residents, but does not want to admit them to settlement, with the various complications that might result. And Japan, while exhibiting resentment at any law that draws attention to race distinction, does not maintain any "right" to inflict her nationals on the United States.

All this maintains the position that "race" is a domestic and not an international question. Now Britten would have the United States make "race" an international issue. He would call together Canada and Australia and other nations to consider concerted action to prevent Japan's defense against a "white menace."

What folly. It is to take cognizance of folly in Japan by meeting it with an equal folly in the United States. It is to invite into concerted action Mexico and South American countries which might easily favor Japan as against the United States, or else to brand these countries as "non-white." It is very questionable whether Mexico, for instance, is "white." And even if Mexico is "white," it is further doubtful whether Mexico would see fit to join with the United States against Japan.

And again, the formation of a "white" alliance against Japan would give fuel to the racial resentment against America that now exists in Japan. The white baiters in Japan are as relatively few as the Japan baiters in this country. The Japanese statesmen realize the reasonableness of the American position. They talk about it no more than they are forced by the more jingoistic among their own countrymen.

But if confronted by an anti-Japanese alliance, they would have a real grievance and a real fear.

The good sense of the great majority of Congress should so thoroughly disavow the Britten resolution as to remove it from serious consideration.

If there is any real occasion for the "whites" of the Pacific to stick together, they will do it without any Britten resolution, we may be sure.

TO THE HORSE

Coupled with the statement of the transportation engineer of the port of New York that the horse "actually is coming back" in city traffic, is the announcement by the Horse Association of America that there are now about 19 million horses and mules actively employed in the United States. The New York engineer says use of motor truck has expanded faster than have street facilities to accommodate the vehicle and that a partial return to the horse is the logical solution of the difficulty. The association volunteers the information that the last census showed there were more horses in the country than ever before. They are actually here, it is declared, although it may not seem so from a glance at the average city street of highway. The horse, it is explained, is busy in the background, about the docks and market places and out in the fields. Added to all this is the statement from a Chicago board of trade official that horses and mules in America consume annually one billion bushels of oats and 40 million tons of hay.

These are facts that should be known. There are those no doubt who have done the horse an injustice in presuming that he practically had disappeared or even in predicting his ultimate demise. The horse, as the school boy said, is a noble and useful animal. Withal, it seems he is a modest animal, too. And he yet lives.

STATE WILL NOT BACK IRRIGATION PROJECT. SALEM, Dec. 20. — The state irrigation securities commission Thursday refused to certify bonds of $98,000 for the Shasta View Irrigation district and $96,000 for the Malin Irrigation district, in addition to guaranteeing interest on the Shasta View district issue for 2 1-2 years. It was brought out that of the bonds issued by the Shasta View district $30,000 worth were to be sold at 83 cents on the dollar. The commission decided that if these bonds could be sold for 85 cents on the dollar the state would guarantee interest on $30,000 of the total issue for 2 1-2 years.

SCIENTIST SEES TOOTHLESS RACE IN NEXT 40,000 YEARS. DENVER, Dec. 22. — A toothless age for civilization in the coming centuries is the drab prediction of Dr. E. B. Renaud, processor of archeology and anthropology at Denver University — unless modern man lays off tea biscuits, chewing gum and toasted marshmallows. Dr. Renaud declares that the process of dissolution of man's molars is already under way, but admits that it will be some 40,000 years before humanity becomes toothless.

"The function of evolution has decreed," Dr. Renaud is quoted as saying, "that future generations shall munch on their gums." Scientists have found ancient teeth much larger than those carried to the dentist's today, the professor pointed out, and later discoveries revealed that in the process of time the various incisors and molars and other teeth had diminished slightly. And this diminishing is slowly but steadily progressing.

The reason for the change, Dr. Renaud declared, lies in the difference of degree of use to which the teeth are put, and he compares the ape-man, who prowled the forests tearing and grinding his food like a wild animal, to the present-day citizen who "nibbles on a tea biscuit, chews gum, bites into a marshmallow, or at most cracks a peanut or grinds a well-cooked steak," drawing this conclusion based on the theory of evolution.

An organ that is used but slightly, or not at all, will gradually disappear. So, like the human beings that lost their tails when it became unnecessary to flit about among the trees, human beings in similar fashion will lose their teeth because of disuse.

These days before Christmas when my wife keeps shoeing me out of the linen chest and the top shelf of the pantry and all of those pet hiding places for Christmas packages — and when I've got taxes — and insurance — and next-to-last payments on one thing and another — I can't help hoping there'll be one box on the Christmas tree with a lot of wrappers and strings and way down in the middle a certificate — saying that I own about $100 worth of more real money in good securities than I think I own right now — the way things look.
