ANOTHER CHAPTER IN A ROMANTIC ANNAL

A recent Brussels dispatch told of the death of Henri Geeraets, a locksmith at Nieuport, and also of the state funeral accorded him.

According to the dispatch, it was because he opened the sluice gates in November, 1914, the advance of the Germans to Calais was checked, the port remained in French hands, and the Belgian army retained a little strip of its native land from which, with the aid of its allies, to continue the battle for the liberation of the country.

So is another added to those romantic chapters in the history of the Low Countries—Belgium and The Netherlands—where the sea has come to the rescue when human defense has failed.

Thus, in the sixteenth century, after the patriot leader, William of Orange, had suffered defeat after defeat at the hands of the Duke of Alba, and it seemed the cause of the Spanish invader would triumph, it was the cutting of the dikes that saved Alkmaar and gave the patriots breathing space to recollect their forces.

More famous still was the forced lifting of the siege of Leyden, when the land around it was inundated, permitting William's fleet to reach the city and put the invaders to route.

ELECTRIC HOUSE HEATING

Electric house heating will soon become general and it is more a question of how soon there will be sufficient electric power generated to heat the houses of the land, than absence of demand.

Leading the world, this nation is approaching the time when it will no longer be heated by the time-consuming coal-burning furnaces or old-fashioned wood-burners generally used.

Wirt S. Scott, manager of the industrial heating department of the Westinghouse Company, reports great progress in solving the problems of heating houses by electricity in a practical manner.

"When that time comes, the days of struggling with the furnace will be over, and the householder will not need to give his heating system a single thought," says Mr. Scott referring to latest inventions.

A reliable authority says there is already 1,250,000 kilowatts of electrical heating apparatus employed by American industries, from bakeries to glue factories and enameling automobile bodies.

LET'S HAVE DRY CONGRESS

Make Congress dry for a week, and see what would happen, is a wet challenge. It should be accepted with alacrity by the Drys.

They should be even more eager than the Wets to have Congress dry every week.

If nothing stands between this country and wetness but the hypocrisy of Congress, then by all means let us be wet.

If our determination to have this country free from the industrial and social and political effects of intoxication is so feeble that it cannot stand the test of making the members of Congress obey the spirit as well as the letter of the law, by all means let us return to the legalized booze system.

Of course the falsity of the wet argument about Congress is very evident.

This argument is that the members of Congress are a set of hypocrites, who think to catch a few dry votes by voting dry laws, and to cater to their own wet instincts as well as the noted indifference of the wets to law, by being themselves wet and winking at the violations of law by their wet fellow citizens.

There is a modicum of truth in this. There are some members of Congress who are personally wet, and vote dry hypocritically. But it is also true that there are some members of Congress, like some citizens, who vote dry sincerely, even though they are loose moraled enough and weak enough in character to continue to take a nip when they have a chance.

But there is also a sufficient number of members of Congress who know the national value of prohibition to vote for it and vote sincerely.

The number of Congressmen who "booze," like the number of citizens, is grossly exaggerated.
By all means, let's have a dry Congress.
The Dry leaders, all over the United States would hail a campaign to that end.

There's small choice. If you lick a small man you're a brute, if you don't you're a coward.

OF MARY
(By Isabelle Wilkie)
Her eyes have that brave light
That smiles
Between the showers of April:
The gleam
That breaks thru cloud-floes
Drifting past the sun;
Windows at night,
Blinds drawn,
Remind me of her eyes
When the inner glow
Escapes the edge of curtains.

ROW IN COUNCIL AT OLYMPIA PATCHED UP
OLYMPIA, Wash., Feb. 5—A last minute compromise between the warring elements in the city government was effected and the session of the council Tuesday night was mild and businesslike. On motion the council rejected all of the mayor's appointments to city positions except two, which they confirmed. The mayor announced that he would make nominations for the vacant positions at an adjourned meeting Monday night and it is likely that they will all be confirmed. All bills for the past month were allowed, so that the functions of government are going on as usual.
