In her eightieth year she made a public address for the enfranchisement of woman and did her part to carry the county and state for Woman's Suffrage, She lived long enough to see Prohibition and Woman's Suffrage incorporated in the National Constitution.

She was extremely fond of poetry and could repeat from memory a large part of the poems of Longfellow, Whittier, Bryant, Poe, Robert Burns and many others. She possessed a judicial mind and could see both sides of a question. With Shakespeare, of whom she had read a great deal, she thought "there was good in everything."
