EXILED OPERA STAR SINGS AS HE TOILS

By NEA Service
VANCOUVER, B. C., March 19—The voice of Caruso lives and sings again, in the carpenter's shop aboard the big Atlantic liner, Empress of Canada, where Alexander Znamensky, formerly of the Moscow Opera Company, wields a busy hammer and fills the ship with classical melody.

The singer, a man without a country, has learned his song well, in the palaces of Russia's old nobility, in prison, in war's brave deeds, in the rice paddies of China where he worked with coolies, in bleak, poverty-lashed Siberia.

Alexander Znamensky is from one of old Russia's noblest families. Today he is first assistant to the ship's carpenter aboard the Canadian Pacific steamer.

Since babyhood he studied music, looking forward to the day when the honors of Russia's Imperial Ballet and Opera would be his. Then, just as his prize came near, the war snatched it away. He fought as a captain during the early days of the struggle, was wounded and sent back.

Then the Revolution cracked the pedestals of the mighty in Russia and Znamensky's chance was gone. For a year only the cold walls of a prison heard his song.

A fellow-officer, pardoned, died in the cell with Znamensky on the eve of release. Znamensky changed into his clothes, walked forth free, but only to become a wanderer on the face of the earth. Fleeing Petrograd (now Leningrad), he suffered the tortures of a Siberian winter.

With a crowd of refugees he reached Shanghai in 1921, in semi-delinquency from fever. He labored as a coolie, living in shreds, wearing what he could find to wear—existing, but barely.

A strike last year caused Canadian Pacific liners to call for volunteer crews. Znamensky volunteered. Now the passengers on the Empress of Canada, stop and listen when his great voice comes booming up from
