GOLF COMPARATIVELY NEW

Golf in America, writes Raymond C. Willoughby, in The Nation's Business Magazine, is barely middle-aged. About forty years ago it wasn't done in public places by the best people. So found Robert Lockhard when he chose Central Park, New York, to practice the game learned in his native town of Dunfermline, Scotland. That enterprise got him arrested. John Reid, who had also come, to New York from Dunfermline, got Lockhard free from the police. Reid and Lockhard put on their knickers and went to Yonkers. There the citizens were more hospitable and the original twosome gradually expanded to the famons "Apple Tree Gang," which in 1888 became the first organized golf club in the United States - the St. Andrews Club now established at Mt. Hope, New York.

Four centuries before the episode in Central Park, the forebears of Lockhard and Reid were playing the game in Scotland. There it became a national sport, and was dignified with the attempts of parliament to legislate if out of existence with ordinances that it be "utterly cryit doune and norh usit." Despite the objections of the civil authorities in Scotland, the game persisted, and the increasing number of them the Edinburgh Burgess Golfing Society in 1735, the Honourable Company of Edinbhrgh Golfers in 1744, and the famous Royal and Ancient Club of St. Andrews in 1754 — the club that set the fashion in rules for the American game. When the game was brought to this country before long and all the 1927. it had the impents of long tradition - "it had its inception in the days of the Huguenots in Holland, was cradled ket 'yet. in the Highlands of Scotland was nursed to robust youth in the days of the Tudors in England," To Ameri- while he was as busy as a bed cans it gave a new measure of independence in life lib eryt, and the pursuit of golf balls. In 1891, three years after the founding of the club at Yonkers, Boston held another tee party and opened the first municipal course in the United States. Although the game still has considerable Scotch in it, it is now America's own by right of numbers.

INTELLIGENT FARMING, BEST SOLUTION

Many farm relief measures have gone before the House agricultural committee, and every one has come out crippled by the assaults of those who want something
