The Perfect American Loaf

Man eats for two chief reasons: to keep his body in health, and to provide it with warmth and the energy with which to do work. He selects some foods primarily because of their energy-giving properties. Bread is one of the most important of these.

Cereal bread is as old as history, and almost as changing. It shows national characteristics as marked as those among people and in each country a standard kind of bread is marked with popular approval. On this continent we have the American loaf.

(1) The perfect American loaf of bread shows full expansion in the baking, with the top pulling but not pulled loose from the sides.

(2) The crust is of a golden brown, showing the presence of grain sugars in the flour—a perfect "bloom" indicative of sweetness and flavor.

(3) Even, silky texture is seen in the crumb of the loaf, with fine division of the cell walls indicating easy digestibility. It is clear white in color, with life, and a lack of crumbly dryness. The flavor is sweet and suggestive of the nuttiness of the wheat berry. This loaf is both palatable and wholesome, and one of the very best energy builders in the scale of foodstuffs.

Each loaf is made from Fisher's Blend Brand Flour.
