TODAY IS IMPORTANT DATE IN HISTORY OF TELEPHONE

One of the most dramatic and influential episodes in the early life of the telephone took place on June 25, 1876, exactly fifty years ago today, and just three and one-half months after the first successful telephone had been transmitted by telephone.

The International Centennial Exhibition was held in Philadelphia in the summer of 1876. Exhibits were sent from all over the world, and many distinguished guests visited America to attend. Among those who exhibited at Philadelphia was the young Alexander Graham Bell who, only a few short months before, had invented the telephone. Mr. Bell's modest exhibit of a half dozen pioneer instruments was located on a table in an inconspicuous corner near the great Hook and Hastings Organ, one of the wonders of the Centennial, on the East Gallery of the Main Building.

Late in the afternoon of Sunday, June 25, 1876, a party of the judges of electrical instruments and instruments of precision, including Professor Joseph Henry, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and Sir William Thomson of England, one of the most famous scientists of that time (accompanied by a number of distinguished visitors including Dom Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, and the Empress Theresa, passed along the Gallery at the end of a long and somewhat tiring tour of the exhibits. With them, though but little noticed, came Alexander Graham Bell. The party stopped just in front of the great organ. A suggestion to adjourn was offered and agreed upon and the party started to disband when the Emperor Dom Pedro noticed Mr. Bell whom he had met in Boston and in whom he had become interested because of Bell's work with deaf mutes.

Instantly interest was aroused in this young man whom the Emperor was greeting in a friendly way. Mr. Bell explained that he had an exhibit he had hoped the judges would consider. The Emperor asked to see it and was conducted to the small table in the corner where Mr. Bell explained that his invention was a device to "talk by electricity."

H asked the Emperor to try his invention and showed him how to place the telephone to his ear. Mr. Bell then went to the other end of the wire and talked into a transmitter. As the Emperor listened, the look of incredulity changed to amazement and slowly taking the telephone from his ear he exclaimed in awe-struck tones, "My God! It talks!"

Quickly the other members of the party took the receiver and listened to Mr. Bell's words coming over the wire. The significance of the event was not lost to the scientists present.
