Parent-Teacher Notes

(Concluded from last week)

After school age is reached, the danger of overstimulation is not over. Competition is always present, and the natural vying of children with each other in games and play. As they get older, extra lessons — music, dancing, languages — may be a further drain on their energy, and social activities, such as club work of various sorts, may fill the day's program to overflowing. All of these things being good and desirable, there is a temptation to overcrowd the child, but a wise parent will always keep in mind the balance between work and rest. It may be asked, what is the proper amount of sleep for a child of six, of eight, etc. The answer cannot be an exact one, since it is partly an individual program. Children vary in the amount of sleep they need. But a good guide is the table put out by the United States Bureau of Education (prepared by the London County Council).

Ages in Years	Hours of Sleep Required
4	12
5 to 7	11-12
8 to 11	10-11
12 to 14	9-10

This is likely to be insufficient for the mainwaring, the "nervous," or the below-par child. For such a child the hours of sleep should be lengthened, or better still, rest periods inserted into the day, to prevent fatigue. Just as the individual child varies in the amount of sleep he requires, so he varies in the time at which he sleeps best. Some children — and these are generally the ones who need sleep the most — do not go to sleep easily at night, but sleep late in the morning.

The practical question then confronts the mother — shall she waken the child and insist on his getting up in time for school? Or shall she let him "have his sleep out"? There are good arguments on both sides and the mother must weigh them all and make a decision.

On the one hand is the importance of the child's keeping up with his class, and the character training involved in meeting his obligations. On the other, the serious danger of the child getting deeper and deeper into the slough of fatigue. Each case must be decided on its merits, but short rests during the day will be likely to offer a solution. These rest periods should be continued during vacation for the overactive but below-par child, so that he may get the best out of this period of playtime. But "going to bed" and "taking a rest" are bug-bears to the average child and it requires some reasons other than that it is "good for him," to make the going a willing one. If his co-operation can be obtained however the time in bed is likely to be more truly rest. Perhaps the child is underweight and can be interested in gaining, keeping a chart of his growth, and trying to beat his own record, if he must play the game alone. Or he may be granted some especial privilege as

Hot Weather Necessities

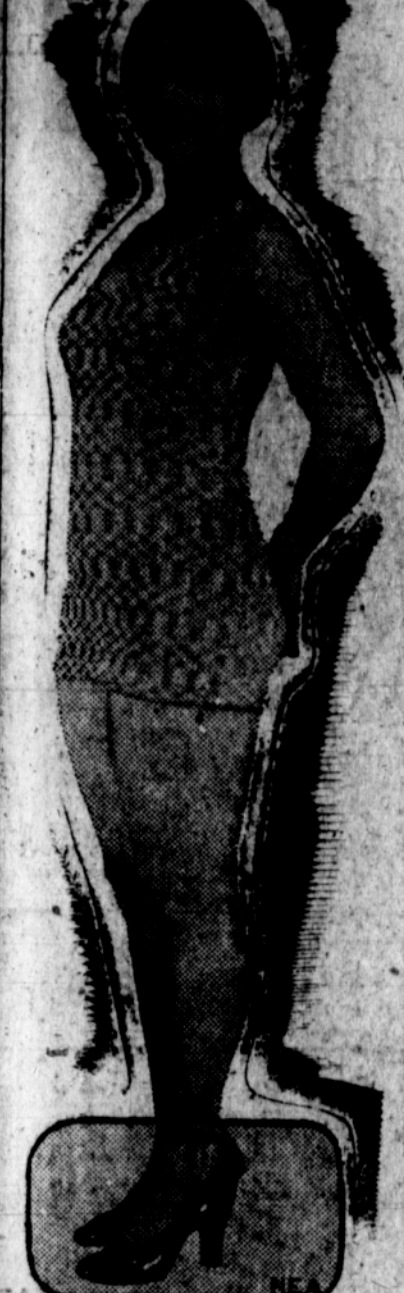

Electrical appliances, to reduce the severity of housekeeping during the hot summer months, are no longer a luxury, but a necessity from the viewpoint of economy, convenience and greater satisfaction.

a reward for peaceful resting. Children should be taught what sleep does for them in repair work and in growth, also the best condition for refreshing sleep — an open window, a dark room, warm, light covering, etc. Willingness to rest, plays its part.

and for a daytime rest half an hour or twenty minutes of willing quietude, outweighs in value twice that length of time spent in toiling about.

Ability to rest is well learned in childhood. It is an asset all through life, and one that too many Americans lack. All too many are the people who are "too tired to rest" whose condition and state of mind are the despair of their friends. Children can be trained to avoid this pitfall by being given a right conception of the relation of rest to activity and activity to rest. Not by quelling their ardor, or making them over-careful, but by showing them how a proper amount of rest will enable them to achieve their ambition, be it what it may.

July Proving To Be Lively Month

July is proving a lively month for land settlement activities promising to show a satisfactory record as the opening month of the second half of 1929. Although the advertising of Oregon's farm opportunities has been temporarily discontinued to be renewed in the fall, the quickened interest of Eastern and Midwestern farmers gathers momentum. The daily mail of the Land Settlement Department of the State and Portland Chambers of Commerce brings a glist of inquiries as well as questionnaires

Marysville Has Disastrous Fire

MARYSVILLE, Cal., July 25. — (UP) — Flames which threatened to engulf the business district were halted early today after local fire fighters called on the Yuba City department for help. The damage is estimated at approximately $500,000.

Anyhow, the French folks are getting an intensive knowledge of arithmetic.

bearing signed statements of intention to come to Oregon. Trains, boats and automobiles are bringing groups of desirable farmers eager for new homes in the midst of Oregon's "green grandeur."

Many of these homeseekers pass through the department's gateway offices at Ontario, where they are greeted by A. H. Fasel, and at Ashland, where Arthur Foster represents the organization.

Not a few of the prospective farmers have tried their hand at agriculture in foreign countries, letters of inquiry having been received lately by W. G. Ide, manager of the State Chamber, from men in Switzerland, Germany, England, Denmark, Chile, Peru and Japan. All evidence indicates that even as this year is going to yield a splendid crop record for Oregon, so its harvest of new settlers, located where success is assured them, will be abundant. Because of favorable land values and the realization of the financial returns to be made from specialty farming in this state, the tide of population is turning to Oregon farms.
