Broken Children

The spiritual of the morally broken child. This is our "slough of despond." This is where we find the greater part of our delinquent children. Often our dependent children are simply the result of adult selfishness, weakness, sin and dissipation. When children look into our faces and see no reverence, no faith, no spiritual poise, no moral strength, they cripple and fall and the sin is upon our shoulders. Broken homes throw many little children into the arms of the juvenile court.

Only eight children out of every hundred are problem children.

First, try to influence the boards of education in your respective communities to establish special classrooms for handicapped children in order that they might not be removed from the personal care of their mothers and the environment of their homes. Second, to endeavor to get some definite program across for the over-bright child. Third, to appoint juvenile court committees in the communities where you have juvenile courts and to help in the establishment of juvenile courts where there are none. We must have social courts, courts of conscience for children and not hurry them into our criminal courts to be broken and destroyed during the impressionable ages of child life. Fourth, in our legislative committees let us urge the registration of dependent children, in order that they not be lost like
