ASHLAND MAN SCALES HIGH RAINIER PEAK

Harold Allison, Local School Teacher, Makes Difficult Climb

IN HEAVY BLIZZARD Reaches Top of One of the Most Difficult Mountaintains in the world

PARADISE INN, RAINIER NATIONAL PARK, Wash., Sept. 9. — Battling his way over a wilderness of ice, across bottomless crevasses and along rocky ledges at the very edge of infinity, to three miles above sea-level, Harold W. Allison of Ashland, Ore., reached the summit of Mount Rainier, 14,408 feet high, in Rainier National Park, through a blinding blizzard, a few days ago.

A Weary Climb

Allison's long trip started from Paradise Inn, 5,557 feet above sea-level, where he had gone with the purpose of climbing the famous mountain. The start was made at 1:30 in the afternoon, and Camp Muir, the government shelter cabins at the half-way point, 10,000 feet up, was reached at 7:30. Here the party rested until a little before 3 the next morning, when the drive for the summit was begun. A raging blizzard was encountered at Gibraltar Rock, and though this the party struggled to the summit, arriving at the crater there at 10:15 a. m. An indication of the difficulty of the climb may be gained from the fact that as the party neared the summit, only 15 or 20 steps could be taken between rests. They were forced to rest standing, as reclining in the snow and rising again would consume too much greatly-needed energy.

Biting Snow Storm

The party spent but a short time in the fantastic steam caves in the crater in the summit of the extinct volcano, because of the biting edge of the snow-storm. They found themselves surrounded by conditions very similar to those found by explorers in the far North. The return trip was quickly begun, and Paradise valley again reached at about 5:30 p. m.

HIS VIEWS CONFIRMED

This view is impressed on him from all sides by politicians, business men, civic leaders, and those in a position to detect undercurrents of sentiment. This view is held so strongly that the question of modification scarcely enters into consideration at all. All attention is being focussed on the problems of enforcement.

Confers With Sargent

Attorney General Sargent arrived at White Pine Camp Tuesday for an indefinite stay. Of the many questions, to be discussed between the president and Sargent, prohibition enforcement will be one of the most prominent. Sargent has refused to consider any alternative to rigorous enforcement.

It is probable that the President's discussions with Sargent will result in his including in his next message to congress an endorsement of the Goff enforcement bill which would centralize all enforcement machinery in the hands of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Lincoln C. Andrews, and eliminate the divided authority now shared by Commissioner of Internal Revenue Blair Andrews has intimated the enactment of this bill was essential to his remaining in office through the coming winter.

Andrews on Vacation

Andrews is vacationing at Lake Champlain, a short distance from here. Whether he will be invited to visit Paul Smith's is doubtful as the President desires to keep discussion of prohibition in the background until after the election, so as not to embarrass republican candidates who are wet or are trying to skate over thin ice.
