This world is a social place, made up of countless numbers of little social units called homes. And it is within these homes that our entire fabric of well-being is But a house is not a It is merly a place in until it radiates hospithis can only be brought about by intelligent love. True hospitality implies the entertaining of friends or strangers without expectation of reward, yet only too many "social affairs" backed up by a desire to get something in return. The only right foundation for hospitality is love -love for one's home and its work as a diffuser of joy-love for one's family and the happiness of each and every member stranger that is within one's
