BROTHERS TO BE TAKEN TO SALEM
 the all night conference.
 On the witness stand Walter Reddford, who was instrumental in securing the conviction of Hugh through his testimony in the case, and instrumental with three other postal authorities, A. W. Demmings, T. Jefferson and Long, in securing the confession, pleaded for the lives of the brothers.
 The following named jurors were impaneled, the twins pleaded guilty to the charge and the verdict was returned: Charles Wing, H. H. Pringle, W. E. Morris, Jonas Wold, George Barnum, Claude Saylor, Wm. F. Isaacs, C. M. Kidd, Scott Davis, Tom Dunnington, Alfred Norris and H. F. Meader.
 Confession of the brothers brings the complete solution to one of the most dastardly crimes in the annals of criminal history. The four men killed in the holdup were: Sidney L. Bates, engineer; Marvin Seng, fireman, shot in the back while his hands were raised above his head in an attitude of surrender; Boyl O. Johnson, brakeman; E. E. Dougherty, mail clerk.
 All of the men were Ashland residents and the people of this city were incensed by the heinous crime and there was scarcely anyone in the city who did not participate in the search for the criminals following the wreck.
 It was 10 days after the holdup before suspicion was attached to the D'Autremont brothers, and postal authorities and crime experts started to weave a chain of circumstantial evidence, which seemed impregnable.
 For four years the search for the brothers continued and it was not until March 15 of this year that Hugh, the youngest of the trio, was caught in the Philippine Islands where he was serving in the U. S. army.
 He stoutly maintained his innocence and during the entire period of the trial never once showed that the strain of guilt was on his soul.
 The confession of the three brothers came as an unexpected climax and solution to the crime.
 The three brothers will be taken to Salem tonight under heavy

INTERVIEW CONFESSION
 We went into the crime with a full realization that it meant death to us or probably death to somebody else," Hugh stated. "The idea had been in our heads for two years." Ray confessed. "Tired of the economic slavery, we had determined to free ourselves of the bonds which held us and make a final desperate effort to gain the freedom which we wanted."
 "We were mad when we formed the idea and when we committed the crime." "If we could, we would gladly restore the lives of the men whom we killed. Our thoughts had been morbid for several years."
 "I got a diploma in one hand and 45 automatic in the other," Hugh interposed, "and went from the commencement to banditry."
 "We were tired of life, squalor, slavery, and didn't place any value on lives—either our own or other people's lives. We were ready for a suicide or a wholesale death club. We wanted economic emancipation or death," one of the boys said.
 Roy and Ray started the plot, and he had persuaded Hugh, although he was soaked up with hard work, and it not require any too much persuasion, Roy stated.
 "We wanted a man whom we could trust even to the very gates of Hell—a man who didn't fear death."
 "We hid in the mountains near Hill and Roy started back to Eugene with the idea of getting the car. He got a job at Central Point with a deputy sheriff and when he found out the officers had us spotted as the bandits, he rushed back to our camp, dodging the officers, but finally getting back to us," Hugh said in telling is of the escape.
 "After 10 days spent in the camp, we went south and stayed together for about a month when we separated. It's a long story about our travels, with always the 'ear that we would be caught.'" guard to enter the prison walls never again to be free men.
 The three boys said they wanted to spare their parents and as much as possible said they appreciated the splendid treatment by the officers. "We are ready to take our punishment."
 The people of this community breath with relief that the strain of suspense and uncertainty of the conviction of Hugh on circumstantial evidence has been cleared away and are glad that the perpetrators of the dastardly crime must now pay for the crime, with a sentence which is even more lasting than would the hangman's noose would have been.

"STRANGLER" IDENTIFIED
 Police Say Little Doubt Suspect Is Fiendish Criminal
 PORTLAND, Ore., June 23.—(AP)—There is no doubt but that Ardan Harris, Portland's "dark strangler," and Earle Nelson, held for murder in Winnipeg, are the same man, according to Portland police.
 Further identification of the man who is charged with choking women to death occurred here when Mrs. Sophia S. Yates, aged widow, identified a picture of Nelson as that of Harris.
 It was at the home of Mrs. Yates that Harris stayed following the murder of Mrs. Florence Monks, Seattle.
 Valuable jewelry was given to Mrs. Yates by Harris and this later was identified as loot which was taken from the Monks home in Seattle.
 Harris also was accused of mur-
