OUTLINE NEW MAIL ROUTE (Continued From Page One)

At present because of the fast sight train out of Portland, Lakeview for instance gets their mail from Portland three hours earlier than Ashland does. Portland morning papers arrive in Lakeview now at noon, whereas they do not get here until about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, a slower train bringing the mail to Ashland. One possibility of the new arrangement will be the sending of Portland mail via Klamath Falls to Ashland. This would arrive in Klamath Falls at 8 a. m. The stage, which would wait for this train, would pick up the Ashland mail and bring it here several hours earlier than it now arrives.

The new contract contemplates the discontinuance of the present Ashland-Klamath Falls and the Klamath Falls-Keno star routes. Bids on the new contract are to be received at Washington until July 19th.

er touring car driven by E. R. Parsons, Portland, as a private bus from Los Angeles to Seattle, skidded off the highway in exactly the same place, overturn in mid air and alight, wheels down directly on top of the coupe at the bottom of the 35 foot embankment—crushing the coupe down into the mud and smashing the top, breaking all the glass and practically ruining the entire body of the smaller machine.

Occupants of the Parsons bus were injured. Parsons suffered from a scalp wound and three women and a child, passengers, suffered from bruises and cuts. The four passengers were taken to the hospital at Yreka for treatment.

The steering wheel on the Parsons bus was damaged and the body of the car badly battered, but Mr. Parsons drove the car back to Yreka after it was lifted from the ravine into which it had skidded.

W. H. Drummond, foreman of the state maintenance crew placed two men at the slippery spot to guide cars over it during the night after the two accidents occurred. Traffic Officers O. O. Nichols and C. P. Talbot investigated the wrecks and cleared the highway, which was blocked immediately following the accident.

The drizzling rain made the highway treacherous last night.

Young Folks Go To Summer Camp

Together with their pastor, Rev. H. T. Mitchellmore, six young people of the Presbyterian church of this city left today for Grants Pass, Oregon where starting today and continuing until July 3 the annual summer conference, of work, play and worship is to be held. All Southern Oregon Presbyterian young people are included.

Meetings are being held in the Grants Hall, one and one-half miles from Grants Pass.

A trip to the Oregon Caves is one of the big features of the convention.

A splendid faculty of outstanding workers of the church will direct the recreational and study periods of the young people.

Those from Ashland who went were: Lorrain Brookmiller, Lorrain Sparr, Letha Miles, Emily Taylor, Catherine Graham and Lawrence Mitchellmore.

NO-REGULAR FORUM MEET—Directors of the Chamber of Commerce will meet at the Lithia Springs Hotel Tuesday noon. No forum program has been prepared but any of the members interested are invited to attend the meeting, and present any questions they may desire to present for consideration.

SID BATES GENTILMAN, DIES AT POST OF DUTY

a bestial anger at the valor of the engineer suffused the ugly heart of the D'Auntremont called Hugh. Decency against indecency. Cleanliness against uncleanness. The unreasoning, uncompromising hatred of the weak for the strong. So they shot Sid Bates, the engineer, with never a saving trace of pity in their hearts—and the soul of him went out in oily, faded denim, bravely, as was his habit. Sid Bates the engineer, who would not turn a wheel for them.

"So, as we have said, against the foulness of the confession, against the utter blackness of three unrepentant murderers, there stands the brave wrath of a most gallant man. It is as though he would say to life and those who live: 'I died not without a certain honor, and according to my code. I would not turn a wheel for them.' And the ethics of Sid Bates, the engineer, are luminous all round him. They cause him to stand forth, in well washed denim, smirched with fresh oil, in a sort of white radiance. The smile on his lips, the jest he made when a finger crooked to give him death. The ethics of Sid Bates were of the simplest, and yet they cannot be added to, nor can anything be taken away from them. They were an abiding belief in decency and duty. It is good to think that murder cannot obliterate the code for which he died.

"We have heard often of ethics in court rooms, of fairness and candor, of courage and the strong will to suffer what may come, if come it must. We have heard murderers extolled, and witnesses browbeaten, to the end that the innocence of the guilty might be declared through prejudice. And we have heard sob's of oratory, and rounded periods of rhetoric, and a welter of confused tribute and appeal to justice, which abides in ethics. So that at times, and small blame to us, we have ourselves forgotten the code of honor, and have thought it all to be a great game, sharp and deceitful, played within the law and by and between its servitors and priests. And we have been led, like gamins at a dice game, to extol and admire trickery, and to celebrate the victories of wrong. That is why it is good for us to regard the brave shade of Sid Bates, the engineer, to whose though no doubt came, nor any faltering, nor any fear.

"There is good to be had of almost anything, however loathly. Thus one finds good in the confession of the three murderers called D'Auntremont. It is not theirs, nor can they apprehend it. It is that of an engineer who was known as Sid Bates, and who had the Sisk'you run a few years ago. There's a green light somewhere for him, and the track is clear."
