ST. PAUL, Minn.—American women have gone mad over furs.

This was the unanimous expression of fur dealers in this big fur center today.

Dealers have been hard pressed to meet the demand for furs this year and the next season promises even greater demand. Prices are higher, they say, but that makes no difference to the women—they want the best they can get and they'll pay the money to pay for them.

As a result there are more trappers going into the woods this winter than ever in history. Dealers are uncertain what result this will bring—but they are offering better prices in advance than they ever did before. This looks like higher prices for next year, they admit.

There are more animals this winter than in many years, according to trappers' reports, and they'll be needed to meet the demand, say dealers.

In this section approximately 80 per cent of this year's furs have already passed over the retail counters. In the east, according to reports, 60 to 90 per cent of the trade has already bought and the remainder of the sales will be Christmas trade, it is believed.

The unusual run on furs is due to general prosperity throughout the country, dealers declared, and particularly due to the prosperity of the feminine pocketbook.

"During the war and since," said the leading fur garment producer of the country, "women have earned more money than ever before. In comparison with men the wages of women have been all out of normal proportion. They want good clothes—fur coats, fur trimmed coats, neck pieces, muffs and fur lined leather or cloth coats. Hundreds of women who never before felt they could afford good furs are buying now."

"My personal opinion is that this demand won't last more than another fur season."

The demand will likely be great next fall but the next year it will drop off," he said. "The desire for furs will be largely satiated by the end of next year," he added, explaining that it was merely a guess and that to one can tell what the American woman will do.

Natural muskrat, seal dyed muskrat and racoon furs are the most popular.

Because of the huge demand for muskrat furs, prices for raw skins have jumped from as low as 7 cents each to more than $2 each in fifteen years. Last year prime northern muskrat skins sold for $1.70. Already some fur dealers are telling trappers they will pay from $2.10 to $2.50 for raw skins this year.

As a result of high prices for raw skins every farmer boy, every settler, and every hunter in the north woods is getting ready to jump into the trapping game this month with a vim. One dealer pointed out all the things a back-woods boy could buy if he trapped only 50 or 100 muskrat this fall and sold them at prices offered.

But every boy can't trap wild animals and get away with it, experienced trappers pointed out. It takes someone who knows the game to set good skins, take care of them, keep them fit and sell them right.

There's been a lot of talk about fox farming, rabbit farming, muskrat farming, mink and otter farming and all other kinds of farming. "City folks who don't know the great out-of-doors" would naturally think the choicest furs would be those bred and raised in captivity," said a buyer.

"They figure that animals selected, segregated, fed and cared for should produce better fur. That may be true in domestic stock, but exactly the opposite is true when it comes to fur animals. Naturally wild animals are bound to deteriorate in captivity. They are not in their natural state. But the most important difference is the temperament of the animal."

"Surprised? Yes, I guess most folks are surprised that the temperament of an animal largely decides the quality of its fur."

"You've seen a dog or cat bristle up its back when it gets mad? Well, all wild animals die fighting. Their guard fur is set. That's the most important thing I know of in getting good fur. Their back fur is bristled up and it stays that way."

"Take a tame animal. After long captivity and peaceful life it loses that guard fur and as a result the pelt is second or third grade, or no grade at all. When it is chloroformed, shot or otherwise killed there is no fight in it—no struggle—no guard fur tensed to make the pelt perfect.

"The pelts of wild animals are always preferable. And they are harder to get—and naturally higher priced. But the average woman wants the best fur obtainable if she can possibly afford it."

Getting back to women's fancy tastes they're running riot, say the dealers.

In the east, particularly, there is a demand for high-priced furs. Matching is the hardest thing fur manufacturers have to battle with. Garment makers must match rat skins and coon skins in order to sell a coat. Women won't stand for blotched garments. To match skins takes expert's time and searching. There has been a fad of "mottled" rat skin coats, one light and one dark placed alternately. These are mostly southern rat skins mixed with northern rat skins—resorted to by manufacturers to reduce costs—since southern skins are lighter and not nearly so good as northern rat skins. All the best rat skins come from the northern reaches of Minnesota, Montana, North Dakota, Wisconsin and Michigan. Most of the coon skins come from the southern states.

Foreign furs are popular among the very rich. Russian sable coats for instance sell for as high as $60,000. Each skin—the size of a man's two hands lengthwise—costs from $600 to $800, and sometimes it takes 800 to 1,000 skins to make one coat.

Ermine and chinchilla are more popular now for trimming among the rich. Nutria, a south American rat, is also a high priced fur. Otter and mink are being used on slightly cheaper coats for trimming and for small pieces.

Lamb lined leather and cloth coats are also popular. The old pony coat, bearskin coat and wolf-skin coats and muffs are all out of date. Few manufacturers
