What could be a more fitting memorial than a beautiful picture in a school room, where one generation of children after another may gain good and true inspiration? There are none of us but what feel we should like to be thought of during our lifetimes and remembered kindly afterward, and surely a gift picture ever before the eyes of young people would long perpetuate one's name and good deeds. About twenty of our prominent citizens have been asked to donate pictures to the school rooms and it is hoped not one will fail to respond. Each picture so given is furnished with a brass name plate on which is handsomely engraved the name of the donor.

There are no doubt many in town who would like to give one of these pictures and each gift will be greatly appreciated. Anyone wishing further information in regard to this matter may obtain same from either Superintendent G. A. Briscoe or Mrs. Louis Dodge.

FEEDING AND CARE OF STOCK FOR BREEDING

THE FOLLOWING SPEECH WAS DELIVERED TO ATTENDANTS AT ASHLAND'S MID-WINTER FAIR, FRIDAY AFTERNOON, BY PROF. CHARLES S. BREWSTER. Poultrymen are now being confronted with the problem of how to secure the greatest number of high quality chicks in their spring breeding work. This is a vital problem in many ways and should receive the most careful consideration. By "quality chicks" we mean little fellows that are large, strong, vigorous and husky; that "pop" out of the shell in large numbers and which are free from disease. Such chicks will live and thrive and grow rapidly if given a proper chance and if the stock from which they came has been properly bred, will give results in egg production. Good chicks are the foundation upon which you are building for your success next year. Failure to produce good chicks will mean fewer or poorer pullets next fall and consequently less profits. Assuming that the breeding birds are strong, healthy and vigorous, that they have been properly selected and mated so that the chicks will inherit the tendency toward high egg production, the next question of importance has to do with the proper care of the breeding birds in order that their eggs may be suitable for hatching. The style and type of the house to be used should not differ materially from the open front laying house commonly used, but particular care should be taken to see that there is an abundance of fresh air and all of the sunshine the weather will permit. Plenty of room should be provided, as breeding birds should never be crowded. Crowding makes sufficient exercise impossible and means danger from disease and parasites. If the birds are to be mated in small units it may be desirable in some localities to use small colony houses but in this climate during the long rainy season it is generally considered more desirable to use a long house, possibly a little narrower than the laying house, which may be divided up into pens as may be necessary, and in which one can work in comfort without the necessity of being out in the rain continuously, as is necessary with the small separate buildings. It is generally conceded that it is desirable to give the breeding birds as much outside range as is possible. This provides natural conditions and the exercise in the open air tends to make them rugged and hardy and to keep them in a healthy condition. The range is more desirable if there is some green food for them to secure. Absolute cleanliness and sanitation in the house are, of course, absolutely essential. The object in managing breeding birds should be to keep them healthy and vigorous—to develop rugged, sturdy, hardy constitutions. The effort should be to secure quality in the eggs, even if high egg production must be sacrificed to some extent. Plenty of exercise should be the rule at all times. This can best be secured by feeding all of the grain fed in a deep litter of dry straw. By a deep litter is meant at least six inches of straw. More may be used. It should be changed as frequently as necessary to keep it clean and dry. Damp, heavy litter is worse than one as the birds can not work in it and it tends to spread or develop disease. Lack of exercise tends to increase fat formation in the body, the birds become sluggish, lose their appetites and digestive disturbances follow, all of which is bound to affect the fertility and hatchability of the eggs and the livability of the chicks. The feed for the breeding stock should be very much the same as for the laying flock, but there are some changes which are advisable. With the laying flock the object is to get large numbers of eggs and they should be forced to eat all they can hold so that their egg producing machinery can work at its maximum capacity all the time. In other words, it is a question of feeding them so much that they must "lay or bust." But with the breeders it is quality and not quantity that is wanted: First, large uniform eggs with good strong shells; second, a fair number of eggs; third, strong germs; fourth, a heavy albumen, dense and free from an excessive amount of water. Such eggs are only secured from healthy, mature hens fed a properly balanced ration. The ideal method is to keep the hens on just a maintenance ration after the moulting season, just keeping them in good condition. They should be allowed to rest and egg production should not be encouraged until about a month or so before the hatching season. Mash feeds, and particularly the meat feeds included in the mashers are designed to stimulate egg production, therefore the hens should be fed less of these feeds, and more of the whole grain or scratch feeds. If you are mixing your own mash cut down the amount of meat feeds in the mash to 10 or 15 per cent. If you are feeding a prepared mash, as most commercial poultrymen are doing, and are feeding the laying flock so that they will eat equal parts of grain and mash, increase the grain ration for the breeders until they are eating twice as much grain as mash. If any difficulty is experienced in doing this it may help to keep the mash hoppers closed part of the day. Feed no moist mash. Do not feed green cut bone, as it seems to affect the fertility of the eggs. If sour milk or fresh buttermilk is available give the hens all they will drink, or as much as possible. If neither of these can be obtained readily, use condensed buttermilk. The lactic acid content of the sour milk or buttermilk acts as a tonic and conditioner and keeps the digestive tract in a healthy condition. Provide plenty of green feed in the form of kale, mangels, carrots sugar beets, and cabbage, or let the hens run on a pasture of alfalfa, clover or young oats, barley or rye. If green feeds are not available in sufficient quantity give the flock Epsom salts at the rate of one and one-half pounds per 100 hens, giving this amount in the water that the hens will consume in one day, every two or three weeks. The condition of the droppings will determine how often to feed the salts. Whenever they become dry or crumbly it is time to give the salts. Some authorities claim that the heavy feeding of mangels will result in a lower fertility in the eggs. Plenty of fresh, clean water is always essential for any kind of chickens.

To sum it all up, we might say that for breeding hens a ration composed largely of whole grain, fed in a dry litter to force exercise, plenty of green feed, milk, water, grit, shell and charcoal is all that is needed to keep them in good condition and that only sufficient mash should be added to produce sufficient eggs for hatching. As soon as the breeding season is over begin to gradually increase the amount of mash fed until the hens are on a full ration, and force them for production the balance of the season. Remember that it never pays to trust blindly to "luck" in any line of poultry work. Good hatches of strong, livable chicks are not the result of "luck." They are the definite result of proper breeding, careful selection, and painstaking care in the management of the breeding stock.

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. McCampbell of Seattle are in Ashland this week, guests of the former's sisters, Mrs. Viola Stone and Mrs. Lou Roberts. This is the first time Mrs. Stone has seen her brother in 23 years. During the week they motored to Dunsmuir to visit Mrs. J. A. Pate, another sister, after which they left for their home in Seattle. The storm that was scheduled yesterday arrived with the nightfall and kept it up pretty well all night. This morning much more snow had fallen on the mountains, while in the valley sleet fell at intervals throughout the forenoon. From present indications winter has set in for good and promises to be an old-fashioned moist one. A new $15,000 Robert Morton organ for the Vining theatre has arrived and is now being installed. The opening date of the new instrument will be announced later.

Guests stopping at the Hotel Columbia are Hazel Reed of Oakland, Calif., F. M. Dodson and wife and E. P. Sullivan of Dunsmuir, E. L. Wright of Portland and A. J. Hewitt and wife of Hornbrook.
