KEEP THE PROFIT AT HOME.
 The nearer a community gets to supplying, economically, its own needs the richer that community is as a whole. There's a profit in raising agricultural products, live stock and fruit, but it is in most instances the smallest and most uncertain of the profits derived from the articles before they are in shape for the consumer. The profits in manufacturing the raw products are usually larger and more certain than those from raising the same products. All the foregoing are familiar economic truths. The only exception is where manufacturing is carried on with a handicap in the way of power, labor or other cost items.

It would be admitted, without doubt that a community like Wallowa county for instance, would be far richer if every ounce of grain raised was fed to live stock, but it would not pay to slaughter that live stock here because larger plants in central market make enough off by-products in slaughtering and packing, to more than pay the cost of transportation both ways. On the other hand it does pay to manufacture butter and would pay to make cheese in this valley. Grain sold gives one profit. Grain sold as live stock gives two profits. Grain sold as butter or cheese gives three profits to the community.

It would pay if every pound of wool raised in this county was shipped out in manufactured form of cloth, knit goods, etc. Thousands of acres of our best timber land is held by a company that for all we know to the contrary, intends shipping the logs to La Grande there to be manufactured into lumber. If those logs were sawed in this community it would mean hundreds of thousands of dollars paid out here in wages.

What is true for a community is true of a large number of communities, grouped geographically so that in a larger economic sense they form one commercial unit, such as Oregon, or Idaho, Washington and Oregon as the Pacific Northwest. One of the big financial things in these modern days is life insurance. This state is seeding millions in premiums to New York city for life insurance, when every dollar could be kept at home, just as good insurance secured and the money invested in this state. The Oregon Life company is a strictly mutual concern, backed by the leading men and financiers of this state and every dollar of profits goes to the policyholders. In the opinion of this paper, it is the patriotic duty as well as the economic interest of Oregonians to keep our life insurance money at home. It pays.

IN DEBT TO FREDDY.
 By LULU JOHNSON.
 Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

With a wall of anger Freddy dived under the dining room table and took shelter close to the center leg, where he knew that the portly Carson could not follow.
 The laughter of the other guests at the uniqueness of Freddy's escape angered Carson, whose self esteem was as huge as his girth, and his face turned an angry red.
 "You come out or I'll go after you," he threatened as he sought to pull the leaves of the table apart.
 "I won't come out," defied Freddy.
 "I guess you wouldn't let me read your letters."
 Another outburst of laughter greeted this sally, and Carson's face grew even more apologetic. His penchant for writing tender notes was well known to his friends, and he lost the last vestige of self restraint as with a savage jerk he pulled the sections of the table apart that he might reach through and capture the defiant small son of his hostess.
 His jesting demand for the love letter which the eight-year-old had written to his baby sweetheart now threat-

"I CAN READ YOU MARJORIE," HE OFFERED, ened to pass from a joke to an ugly incident, and several of the men who made up the Bayard house party quietly but quickly moved through the archway landing to the library.
 Mrs. Bayard stirred uneasily in her chair and glanced around for her husband, but he was not in sight, and before she could rise to call him Freddy had shown that he needed no assistance. There was a sudden scramble, and then from the end of the table Freddy rolled out upon the floor to regard Carson with an irritating look of content.
 "Where's the letter, youngster?" the man demanded rather sternly.
 "Eat'n' it," explained Freddy, momentarily pausing in his mastication to regard Carson with a pleased smile.
 "I can write another after you're gone."
 "And that's what you went under the table for?" demanded Carson, a smile breaking through the scowl.
 "Sure," assented Freddy. "I knew I could eat it before you could get me. That's the way they used to do when they plotted against kings, only they didn't climb under tables," he added proudly. "I thought of that myself."
 "Take thy freedom, sapient youngster," decreed Carson. "Mrs. Bayard, I owe you an apology, I am afraid."
 Mrs. Bayard nodded and tried to smile, and her small son slipped from the room to the den upstairs. Paul Dayton sat in the window seat watching the white flakes of snow sifting down upon the winter landscape.
 "Come in, Freddy," he said kindly as he saw the youngster hesitate. "Two letters in one afternoon is rather an embarrassment of riches, isn't it? Who is the fortunate maiden?"
 "It's Bess Pyfrom," explained Freddy. "I can always write her after school. I put the letter in a box in the hedge, and she comes and gets it; then she writes me one, and I get it, and then I give her the answer in the morning, and she gives me the answer at recess, and we're going to be married some day," he added irrelevantly.
 "My congratulations," offered Dayton gravely, and Freddy beamed his youthful thanks. Just so did Dayton speak to the "big men," and it was delightful to have his love affair treated with the seriousness it deserved, particularly after the adventure downstairs.
 "This isn't the second letter," he explained. "I was going along the hall, and Mr. Carson met me and asked me what I was up to, and I told him, and he said to let him see the letter."
 "And what response did you make to his impertinent curiosity?" demanded Dayton.
 "I ran under the table and ate it," explained Freddy, with a grin. "Now I got to write another."
 "Which I trust will meet with a happier fate," said Dayton.
 "You bet it will," assured Freddy. "I'm going down the back stairs. I don't see why the big fellows can't let me alone. They all have sweethearts. I guess everybody has a sweetheart. Her name's Evalinda, and her skin's blacker'n his."

 "I suppose that every man should have a sweetheart," assented Dayton a little wistfully. He felt that he cut but a poor figure with the other men in the Bayard house party, but Marjorie Bayard had no more devoted admirer than himself, though he did not tell his love.
 He was still weak and wasted from the fever that had sent him back from the Philippines a mere wreck of his old self.
 "Marjorie said it was all right when I asked her," volunteered Freddy. "Marjorie—that's my nurse—said it was silly, so I asked Marjorie, and she said every man has a right to a sweetheart."
 "I guess she must be right," replied Dayton absently.
 "Sure she is!" assented Freddy. "She's always right. Who's your sweetheart?" he demanded, making conversation tangent.
 "I'm afraid that I have none," said Dayton, with a laugh that sounded dreary in spite of effort.
 "I told you who mine was," reminded Freddy.
 "But I can't tell you when I have none," pleaded Dayton.
 Freddy regarded him searchingly for a moment. His silent query seemed to be answered, for he tossed his head.
 "I can lend you Marjorie," he offered. "She hasn't any real sweetheart." Of course a lot of men want her to be their sweetheart, but she gets tired of 'em so soon."
 "That would be very nice," said Dayton politely.
 "I think I'd like you for a brother," said Freddy appraisingly. "I never had a big brother."
 "They are great stuff, big brothers are," assented Dayton, and in spite of himself a note of eagerness crept into his tones. Freddy nodded his head vigorously and, taking his place at the desk, laboriously composed a second letter, while Dayton stared out of the window in moody reflection.

Since his return from the Philippines he had hated himself for the weakness that seemed to set him apart from the other men. He loved Marjorie Bayard more than ever, but Carver Carson seemed to be the favored sultor. Dayton's illness had made him actually sensitive, and he feared the contrast between himself and the buoyant animalism of Carson.
 He was still looking out across the snow covered street, wrapped in a deep melancholy, when he heard Freddy out in the hall speaking.
 "I'm going to take this across to the hedge," he said. "Is Mr. Carson about?"
 "He will not interfere this time," said Marjorie, with a significant laugh. "Even Mr. Carson seems to realize that the exhibition he made of his temper was very uncalculated. You can take your little letter out without fear that he will trouble you, dear."
 "Bess will be waiting," explained Freddy, putting up his face to be kissed, "and, Marjorie, I told Mr. Dayton that he could have you for a sweetheart. He hasn't any, and you haven't any. Is it all right?"
 "I don't think Mr. Dayton needs your help when he searches for a sweetheart," said Marjorie. She had not quite forgiven Dayton for his coolness since his return.
 "Not his help, but his encouragement," corrected Dayton, swinging around suddenly. "He has convinced me that even a wreck like myself may aspire to happiness. But buoyed by hope, Marjorie, I would soon be myself again. I had not dared hope that you would care for me with stalwart Carson always by your side."
 "Mr. Carson," repeated Marjorie, with a little shudder, "if you could only have seen him a little while ago."
 "Then I am doubly indebted to Freddy!" cried Dayton as he caught her hand, but the look in Marjorie's eyes told him that he was indebted only to himself.
