Higher Prices on Importations.

The very latest import figures show that the prices of materials, manufactures and foodstuffs brought into the United States are steadily going up. The cause may be as difficult to fix as that behind the advance on home products. Foreign exporters may argue that if the American people stand high prices on things raised or made at home they won't cut short purchases of foreign goods because rates go up. On the other hand, it might be supposed that trade policy would lead them to keep prices down and undersell some lines of American goods.

However, statistics relating to importation prices for the last half of 1909 indicate that the advance in the prices of articles brought into the country is merely keeping pace with the upward tendency of prices where the goods originated. It is no new tale that the cost of living is advancing pretty much the world over. Therefore the cost of producing and handling goods for export has advanced in the countries from which we buy. Men in the export trade are conservative, as a rule. They seek, first, to retain trade once built up; second, to gain a fair profit, and seldom put up prices recklessly.

The more the Manchurian railroads neutralization scheme is considered the more it commends itself as well fitted to do equal justice to all and to permit special privileges to none. This should not be an argument against it in the sight of any of the powers.

The announcement of the bureau of statistics that imported necessities have risen in price as much as domestic necessities will give no shock to the ultimate consumer. He long ago gave up as useless looking for a place to dodge.

If Morse follows the tailor's trade in Atlanta prison he may discover that there are ways of cutting a figure in life much more agreeable for him than cutting ice on the octopus plan.

Farming and the National Forests.
In view of the prominence into which forestry has been brought through recent controversies and events, a word upon homesteads within the reservation from the secretary of agriculture's latest report may help to clarify the subject for those at a distance from the regions vitally involved. Believing that the facts had been misrepresented, Secretary Wilson said: "I made personal investigation of these matters during the past summer in the states of Idaho and Wyoming. I found no evidence that the national forests are withholding from settlement land now demanded for agriculture."

Under the act of June, 1906, land within the national forest area may be opened up to settlement. Upward of 1,500 homesteads, with a total area of 140,000 acres, were listed under this act in 1909. Improvement in farming methods and increase in population is likely to increase the demand for farm land such as may be found within the national reserve domain, and the secretary remarks that the present is not the time to decide where the line should be finally drawn as to the advance of agriculture into the forest reservation.

Four sugar trust weighers have been jailed for crooked work that put money in their employers' coffers, and the trust is put to the trouble of finding four "just as good" to fill their places.

Chief foresters may come and chief foresters may go, but "Woodman, spare that tree," will still hold its own as a favorite among forest lovers.
