THE KISS.

How It Made a Man's Fortune and What Followed.

By THEODORE BROWN.
(Copyright, 1910, by American Press Association.)

Three students were walking on the ramparts of Copenhagen. Two of them were wealthy noblemen. The third was a young man of promise, but with no fortune, a necessary adjunct in old countries for assisting one to a career. The commoner was telling his friends of his desire to make something of himself and his inability to do so with no means at his command.

"I must go abroad," he said, "see other countries, mingle with other people. Here we are all frozen up like a glacier and move just about as fast."
"And what will you be if you go away?" asked one of his companions.
"I don't know. I shall at least have an opportunity for development."

The two noblemen were more interested in a lady sitting at a window on the other side of the street bordering the ramparts doing some kind of embroidery than in the aspirations of their companion. If they desired a career there were plenty of avenues open to them by virtue of their rank, but their desire was rather to partake of the sweets of life attainable by means of their fortunes. It was not remarkable that their eyes should be on the lady at the window, for she was young and comely. She had withal an interesting face, bespeaking a kindly nature, and modesty was stamped on every feature.

"Poul," said one of his friends, "do you see that Madonna face over there?"
"Yes."
"Well, if you will get a kiss from those red lips we will defray the expenses of this foreign tour you are so anxious to make."
"Do you mean that?" asked Poul.

Both his friends agreed that if he could get the kiss—willingly, not by force or trickery—they would furnish the required means.
Poul looked long and earnestly at the lovely face, then suddenly started for the house in which the girl sat. The window was on the ground floor, and the two friends saw him go and stand before it, hat in hand. The girl raised the sash, and the young man saw that Poul was telling her of their offer with its provision, for she looked up at them while he spoke. Then she drew him toward the window and gave him a kiss.

The noblemen kept their word, and the commoner went abroad.

It was some years after this incident that a distinguished army officer was recalled by the king from a distant station to Stockholm to receive the appointment of adjutant general, which meant chief of staff, or, in other words, commander in chief of the army.

General Lovenor was the recipient of a great deal of attention. He was unmarried, and many a young girl of Copenhagen set her cap for him, for he was a bachelor and in his prime, being not yet forty years old. Even daughters of noblemen were "thrown at his head," but he would have none of them. One day while riding on horseback, with a couple of orderlies behind him, he passed a lady in a carriage who especially attracted his favorable attention. She was at an age just before women usually pass from youth to middle age.

General Lovenor returned to his quarters to dream of the lady who had thus impressed him. Courted though he was, a trusted servant of the king, admired for his ability and courage, yet there was a void in his heart that needs to be filled in the heart of every man and every woman. For the first time in his life he had seen one whom he thought capable of filling that void.

The next day he rode over the ground he had traversed before and at the same hour, hoping that he might again meet her. But he was disappointed. He would have sought her out, but there was no distinguishing mark by which he could describe her. In vain he looked for her in the gay throngs of young people in the parks, at the theaters, at balls. Months passed, during which he treasured a vision he had seen but once. Instead of diminishing, his monomania, as he called it, increased. Beautiful women, not knowing of his predisposition, continued to try to charm him, but he listened to what they said without hearing and to their efforts gave no response.

"I SHALL NEVER FORGET THAT YOUNG AND ENTHUSIASTIC FACE."

Finally at a social meeting of a scientific association while strolling with a lady on his arm he came face to face with the subject of his dreams. He would have left his companion to follow the unknown had that been admissible, but since it was not he was obliged to content himself by asking who she was. He learned that her name was Ingeborg Vinding; that she was not known in society, her family not being noble; that she had a fine mind, but, owing to a retiring disposition, did not assume that prominence to which her endowments entitled her.

General Lovenor as soon as he was free from attendance upon the lady who gave him this information lost no time in securing an introduction to Ingeborg Vinding. He passed the rest of the evening with her and received permission to call upon her.

There was curiosity on the part of several women who had each set her cap for General Lovenor when he was conspicuous for his absence from the next notable social function. When two or three of such affairs had passed without his being present curiosity had grown into alarm. When it finally began to be whispered that the general was devoting himself to a lady to whom royalty had not given a ticket to the court circle alarm gave way to consternation. When he was seen at the opera with the lady who had unconsciously occasioned this disquietude necks were craned and tongues were leveled at the couple from the circle where sat the aristocracy of Copenhagen.

General Lovenor asked Ingeborg Vinding to be his wife. The manner with which she received his declaration was a puzzle to him. There was not that heartiness in her reply which he had hoped for. He felt toward her a certainty of his own feelings which did not meet with a response. He knew that she was the only woman he had ever wished to marry and was disappointed that she should have doubts as to her wish to marry him.
"I must ask for time," she said, "in which to consider so important a decision."

Days passed, during which the wooer's fate hung in the balance. At last she sent for him.
"There is but one thing," she said, "that separates me from you. Years ago, when I was in the first freshness of youth, I met a young man to whom I gave my heart. He did not enter into my life. Our acquaintance was the Great Events For Enterprise "Fans"

La Grande H. S. and W. C. H. S.
Friday and Saturday—Big Game Sunday.

There are great events in store for the Enterprise fans. Friday and Saturday of this week the La Grande High School team will meet the Wallowa County High School team, at Enterprise in a series of two games, and the public is promised a good entertainment for the two days. The Wallowa County High School team is the aggregation that defeated the Lostine team here last Saturday by a good margin, and the local boys are confident over the outcome of the future games.

Perhaps the big game of the week will be that of the Joseph team and the Enterprise city team, Sunday. The Enterprise boys have just received the new suits, and the Sunday game will be the introduction of the team decked out in the new "trimmings."

Last Saturday's Game.
The game on Saturday between Wallowa County High school and Lostine High school was an extremely creditable exhibition of the national game. It was won by the County high, but their defeat brought no discredit to the Lostine boys, who, considering their lack of training, put up a strong game.

While the local boys played well and deserved their victory, the principal part of the credit belongs to Cramer, who pitched in big league style. Cramer promises to be the flud of the season. He had everything a pitcher needs, including almost perfect control. In the first inning he retired the side with seven pitched balls. In the second inning he struck out Fleener with four pitched balls and immediately followed it up by striking out Leonard with the same number. In the ninth inning he retired the side with four pitched balls. In the nine innings neither a wild pitch nor a base on balls was charged to him. Wilson caught a good game, although the steadiness of Cramer made his work easy. Of the other players, Ault at second and Vest in left, starred. Of the Lostine boys, Cook caught a very creditable game, considering the extreme wildness of Haun, and Sumpter, at first, was a star.

The runs came this way: In the second inning, after Jackson had struck out, Wilson singled to right, went to third on a wild pitch and scored while Bauer was being thrown out from Read to Sumpter. In the third, Craig singled to left reaching second when Hammack left the ball go through his legs to the fence, and directly afterwards went to third on a passed ball. Haun at this juncture very accommodatingly passed both Casey and Vest and interspersed his work with a couple of wild pitches, on which both Craig and French scored. That was all until the fifth inning, when two bases on balls and three wild pitches scored Craig, French and Vest, which ended the scoring for the game. Lostine got its run in the third. After two were out, Cook singled to right and kept on to third when Bauer left the ball get away from him. Haun followed with another into the same territory, on which Cook scored, Haun being thrown out at second, being relayed there by Wilson after it had reached home too late to catch Cook at the plate. The score follows:

Polar Reflections.
How awful 't would be to live at the pole. With no back yard but an icy shoal And no front lawn but a big, deep hole— At the pole!

Nowhere to get your breakfast roll, Nowhere to buy a load of coal, Nowhere to go for a pleasant stroll— At the pole!

Nowhere to sit on a grassy knoll Or the mossy side of a fallen bole And idly loaf and invite your soul— At the pole!

Doesn't it seem a little droll? There's nothing to do but to enroll Your name upon fame's glittering scroll— At the pole!
—Carolyn Wells in New York Tribune.

Professional Advice.
Father Dooley had just tied the knot. He looked expectant, the bride looked sheepish, and Pat, shifting from one foot to another, looked guilty. At last he began, "I—don't like to be mane, father, but I changed me clothes in a hurry and left me wages in me other pants." Then he added in a whisper: "Take me down in the cellar. I'm a plumber, and I'll show ye how to fix the gas meter so 't won't register more than 40 per cent." —Success Magazine.

Fate's Jolts.
If fate hands out a bump to you, Don't quit the game. There is no soft, upholstered road To wealth or fame.

Keep plugging right along and say When you fall flat, "Another jolt from fate, but I Expected that."

A grin is better than a groan. Life's road is tough. But jolts won't stop you if you're made Of proper stuff. —Detroit Free Press.

Word From Br'er Williams.
Ef de ferryman ain't dar w'en you gits ter de river an' de steamboat's done blowed up think o' yo' swimmin' lessons an' jump in, but fer de Lawd's sake don't holler fer rope w'en you git half way 'cross or de world 'll laugh at you an' make you mad enough ter wish you wuz lost in de wilderness.—Atlanta Constitution.

To Get the Fourth Dimension of Space.
[As understood after reading article headed "Boy of Ten Addresses Harvard Teachers."]
Take a hecatonicocahedrigon and multiply by four, A sexicocahedrigon plus half as many more, Put in some polyhedrigons where gaps suggest a minus And you'll have a polyhedral-perpendocahedrigon. —New York Times.

Fixed Ratio.
Actor (on the road)—I suppose you have no idea what the size of our house will be tonight. It varies, doesn't it?
Native—Well, you kin generally tell party accurately by dividing the number of people in the company by two. —Puck.

Cheerful Events.
Molly for a husband sighed— She pined, so 'twas prated— And Anna pined to be a bride Till she was nigh prostrated. But Cupid came to join their side— To mate they both were fated. And thus was Molly mollified And thus was Anna mated. —Kansas City Times.

Appearances.
