Increase Efficiency. (Continued from page 1.)

Dorn-Shakes completely out of the running in short order. When the chickens have eaten a stipulated amount they will be allowed to scratch around for a specified time, at the expiration of which the tungsten lights will be turned out one by one and the crimson globe at the western end of the coop will be turned on in full splendor, its light being gradually diminished until, as the last tungsten is switched off, it will be almost an exact replica of a dying sunset. By this time the roosters, having recognized the approach of bedtime, will have taken their stations on the roosts, and, true to the drowsy examples of their lords and masters, the forty epoch-making hens, with heads tucked neatly beneath their wings, will be wrapped in slumber.

The chickens will be allowed to sleep for precisely four hours, when the sunrise light at the east end of the coop will be slowly switched on. As its rosy effulgence increases the roosters, observing unmistakable symptoms of daybreak, will ruffle up their feathers, rise on their perches, flap their pinions, and with one voice cry out, "My sunrise!" The question as to which rooster is really entitled to the credit for the sunrise will not be debated, however, as each egotistic claimant, believing that he made all the noise, will not be aware that his title is disputed. The hens will at once awaken, and beneath the growing light from the tungstens will partake of a light breakfast. They will then repair to their separate nests, where in due course of time and simultaneously they will each deposit a nice, fresh egg, whose market value will be eggactly four and one-sixths cents, provided the market does not do a Humpty-Dumpty stunt before Mr. Simmons can carry out his present cackle-actions. In joyous chorus the forty devoted biddies will proclaim their individual contributions to the high cost of living.

The entire program will be repeated as often in the course of twenty-four hours as possible, but Mr. Simmons will start operations on a schedule of an eight-hour shift to an egg, or three eggs per day per hen, of which he is satisfied his picked thoroughbreds are easily capable, egged on as they will be by the subtle hand of science.

The chickens that will be employed in the project are all pure, sturdy American stock, such as Plymouth Rocks and Rhode Island Reds. No fancy foreign strains will be given a try-out in the layout. Mr. Simmons is satisfied that they could not stand the strain. Furthermore, he believes that American chickens, like the American people, relish being fooled, and, like the immortal showman who coined the famous epigram, he will proceed to transmute credulity into coin.

A number of interesting experiments will be conducted with the eggs obtained from the electrical hen house, one of which will be the hatching of a number in an electrical incubator. If, as is reasonably expected, these eggs produce hens that from sheer force of hereditary habit will lay three eggs a day under ordinary natural conditions, the prices of the Simmons electrical eggs will be $50 instead of 50 cents per dozen.

Produced as they will be under the most scientific and sanitary conditions, the electrical eggs are expected to be of exceptionally high quality, out-ranking in size and flavor the well-known alfalfa eggs of California.
