Box 458, Cottage Grove, Ore.

After a halt of two weeks, work has again been resumed on the new Cooper building, to be occupied by the Metan Shop.

Experience or experiment, which? Experience knows which way to go. Experiment shows which way you should have gone. Experience chooses, experiment chances. Dr. Lowe uses his experience and leaves experiment to those who prefer the experiment of wondering how things will come out. Experience, successful experience, is the best guide when your eyes are at stake. Dr. Lowe puts the cream of twenty years' experience into his glasses. Consult him.

Robert Sutcliffe preached in Eugene Sunday evening. Rev. W. J. Gardiner occupied the pulpit in his absence.

HUNDREDS MORE COULD HAVE BEEN SAVED

Mrs. Woolcott Tells of Her Experience on Titanic, Its Sadness and Joys.

that one of the saddest things about her whole experience was to think that none of the life boats were filled, and hundreds of those who died would have been saved but for the dreadful chill of the water, which numbed those who had caught hold of pieces of wreckage.

She described as extremely solemn the moments just before the big boat sank, when the lights could be seen going out tier by tier and the strains of "Nearer My God to Thee, played by the band, were carried over the water. Those who did not escape from the boat could be seen to kneel on the decks in prayer just before the wrecked craft made her fatal plunge.

Before telling the story of her miraculous escape from death Mrs. Woolcott gave a vivid description of the Titanic and her sumptuous furnishings.

Mrs. Woolcott stated that the captain was very anxious to get the boat to New York by Tuesday at the latest, and believes this fact caused the accident. She was in her berth at the time the boat struck the iceberg, and said that it sounded to her like a huge crash of glass. She was nearly thrown from her berth, but if it had not been for the stopping of the engines she would not have felt that anything had gone wrong.

"The stopping of the engines on an ocean liner," she said "creates such a calm, such a painful silence, that it inspires passengers that something is not exactly right. Not feeling that anything serious could be wrong, she put on considerable of her clothing before going on deck, reaching there about five minutes after the accident. She was informed of what had occurred, but was assured that there was no danger and she and her friends began to talk of going back to bed again, laughing at the steerage passengers who were putting on their clothing. The first intimation she had of danger was when the passengers were ordered to put on the life jackets. These proved to be the means of saving the lives of many, as they kept off the bitter wind and cold while they were in the open boats waiting for the arrival of aid.

Because of the mammoth proportions of the Titanic, the passengers in one part of the boat had no idea of what was going on in another part and the first intimation Mrs. Woolcott had that passengers were being taken off was when she heard the cry, "Any more ladies?" She then rushed to where a life boat was being lowered and was taken in. There were thirty-five in the boat when it pulled away, six of these being men, and Mrs. Woolcott said the boat would easily have held 15 more.

It was not until after the passengers got onto the ocean away from the Titanic that they could realize that the unsinkable boat was indeed sinking. The boat in which she was saved was rowed away several miles before the big liner went down. They watched the lights go out deck by deck, heard the band play "Nearer My God to Thee," as those still on the wreck went nearer to eternity, and saw helpless men and women still on the deck of the great leviathan of the sea as the two broken parts took their last plunge. Their feelings were beyond describing, as out there on the calm, smooth ocean they waited for the help that was surely coming and thought of the hapless wretches that had given up their lives because there were not boats enough for all.

The life boats were equipped with water and biscuits. The one Mrs. Woolcott was in held six men two of them sailors. They were on the water from 12:30 to 6:30. At 3:30 they saw the Carpathia approaching. "No one can tell the joy there was in our hearts," Mrs. Woolcott said, "When three hours later we were taken up her side on a ladder. The passengers were immediately taken to the purser and given something hot and asked for any messages they wished to send to their friends. It was a great relief to have the friends who had learned of the accident know that they were safe. They were treated well on the Carpathia, all the men, even to the sailors, giving up their berths to the saved women. Some of them had to sleep on straw mattresses, but that was nothing, as long as they could hear the charm of the churning engines propelling them to the friends so anxiously awaiting them. A hundred or more were confined to the hospitals. Many ludicrous costumes were designed out of material that came the handiest, and passengers of the Carpathia with an oversupply were very generous. "One of the things that kept up the spirits of the passengers," Mrs. Woolcott declared, was the amusement they got out of laughing at the queer clothes worn by the survivors. No one saved anything to speak of, many being taken into the life boats in night attire, the women being that some of them lived through the dreadful experience, the exposure in the open boats being severe even to those dressed for it. Mrs. Woolcott was better prepared than many of the others.

In closing Mrs. Woolcott very feelingly thanked those who had given her such a hearty reception. Over 500 people were present in the church and a couple hundred were turned away.

Mrs. Woolcott has a pleasing personality, and her English dialect gave a pleasing touch to her recital.

Mrs. Woolcott was presented with a beautiful purse as a token of friendship from her newly formed Cottage Grove acquaintances.

In addition to Mrs. Woolcott's story, Kipling's Recessional by Ora Read Hemenway, an organ solo by Professor Waterhouse and a solo by Mrs. Waterhouse were enjoyed.

"Unless the people of Eugene make the Guard stop its foul-mouthings about the state judiciary, the president of the O. A. C. and everything else that does not exactly suit the Guard's fancy, Eugene will be put on the bum." This was the statement made by Rev. Sutcliffe at the reception last night to Mrs. Woolcott, when he referred to the slur recently cast on Cottage Grove by the Guard when mentioning that Mrs. Woolcott would make her future home here.

In closing Mr. Sutcliffe declared: "Mrs. Woolcott will find one year in Cottage Grove as good as a century in Eugene or an eternity at the bottom of the sea."

proceeded to give reasons why many did, charging that many misrepresentations were made in its circulation, stating that the religious side of the question was largely lost sight of. He read a portion of the petition in which was stated that the Council was doing something to destroy the fair name of the city. He took up the challenge and warmly defended his own action. He stated that the only excuse there could be for the petition was a religious one, and then asked what the good people who signed the petition would do if the Adventists or some other religious sect which observed some day of the week, other than Sunday, should present a like petition against holding a circus on its religious day. Referring to the constitution of the United States and of Oregon and to the oaths of office taken by the councilman, he said that if they meant anything they meant that every man should have the right of religious liberty and the right to spend the Sabbath as he saw fit. Referring to the demonstration made by the petitioners, he said that the councilman that heard only the voice that reached his ear was not fit to serve as a public official.

Councilman Martin made a point when he expressed the hope that those present would come oftener and see how the Council did things. He referred to his religious training and said that it had been such as gave every person the right to such enjoyment on the Sabbath as he saw fit. Referring to the petition he said that many business men signed it for fear of losing trade, others to get rid of the petitioners, and that it was not representative of the real feelings of the petitioners, many of whom would no doubt attend the big show when it got here. He suggested that if the same energy that had been expended on the remonstrance petition had been spent in giving aid to the needy some good results might have been obtained. "Be more liberal minded," he said, "and you will have more people attending your churches. You can't force things onto people."

He stated that the Council had safeguarded the interests of the church people by prohibiting a street parade. Referring to the importance being placed upon the fact that the circus would come on Memorial Sunday, he stated that he had attended more Decoration Day exercises than many of the business men who had signed the remonstrance.

Rev. Mason secured the floor and backed up the statement of Mr. Knowles that it was indeed a religious question. He stated that he bowed his head in shame before the fact that his native state of California was one of the few that did not have a Sunday law. "If there was no religious work being done here, and there was no religious sentiment here," he stated, "you would all pack up and leave the city." This statement was greeted with applause. Referring to the accusation of misrepresentation in circulating the remonstrance petition, he stated that the claim he made in presenting the petition of which he had charge was that the circus would be harmful from a business standpoint and that he argued with no one.

After the vote on the petition the Mayor suggested that the Presbyterian Church, in which the Memorial Sunday exercises were to be held, close to the ball grounds, and as an old soldier he suggested that some other church be chosen where there would be no danger of disturbance.

W. A. Hogate presented a proposed ordinance to the Council prohibiting the conducting of business and carrying on of amusements on Sunday and asked the Council to give it early consideration.
