Public Libraries.

The very presence of a public library has a meaning and exerts a power for good. Especially is this the case when this presence is made evident by a separate and worthy building. The building which stands for books, for knowledge, for the records of human experience; a house not just like other houses but with marks of permanence, dignity and grace, and evidently so contrived as to call the people in and to distribute freely to them these wise and entertaining books, must be a positive influence in itself.

The children know it for what it is. Old and young, rich and poor, recognize its meaning. It embodies the great idea of a man learning and growing by his association with the wisdom and experience of other men. It is the great clearing house of human intelligence where knowledge is mutually exchanged and everyone can learn what the rest know. It tells the lowest and meanest and most ignorant that here is the opportunity open to everybody to know, and therefore that books are a common concern of the village, by which it sets great store.

If on the other hand, the public library is neglected, or starved with excessive thrift; or if it is crowded into a corner, opened at rare intervals and approached with difficulty, all this influence is lost.

The increase of reading tends to a general broadening of life. Human nature is selfish so long as the man is isolated, for he is controlled by his impulses and passions, and guided by his own narrow ideas.

Our views of life are moulded by reading. The records are here, describing lands and people we have never seen; centuries in which we have not lived; men who passed off the stage in past ages. The discoveries of science, the developments of workmanship, the growth of civilization; thought, wit, fancy, feeling which has appealed to the world, and that study, the study of man, is illustrated in infinitely diverse forms of story and song, all these are in books and they give us the advantage of wide horizons and enlarged acquaintance with life. A community leavened with such influences, where people generally understand, where all grow up from their youth to know, to think, to communicate and to have common acquaintance with the past and the distant and with the secrets of nature, and all the many ways of doing things, is a stronger, happier and more prosperous community because of that very fact, and the books are plainly a means to so desirable an end.

—W. R. EASTMAN.

Grange Against County School Superintendent System.

The following resolutions were adopted by Springfield Grange No. 378 at its last meeting:

"Whereas, after trying the plan of county school supervisors for one year we can see no good derived from the plan, and

"Whereas, it costs the county over ten thousand dollars annually to pay these supervisors, which money could be used to much better advantage in employing competent teachers;

"Therefore Be It Resolved, That Springfield Grange, No. 378 put itself on record as opposing the employment of such supervisors."

PEOPLE SHOULD GUARD AGAINST APPENDICITIS

Cottage Grove people who have stomach and bowel trouble should guard against appendicitis by taking simple buckthorn bark, glycerine, etc., as compounded in Adlerika, the German appendicitis remedy. A single dose relieves sour stomach, gas on the stomach and constipation instantly because this simple mixture antiseptizes the digestive organs and draws off the impurities. New Era Drug Co.
